sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things, and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) fair probability. This attentive circumspection is needful even at the present: such is the repugnancy or forgetfulness which we find in the best Narration, of things following the Battel of Canna. For it is said, that four thousand Foot and Horse gathered together about the Consul Terenius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand, got into Cannusium, choosing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terenius Varro, joining his Company unto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thousand men about him; that these Letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had been taking order for pacifying those Tumults in the City, which grew upon the first bruit of the Overthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent unto Terenius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those Letters, which over-took (in a manner) at Rome the first news of the Overthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman Camp, and trussed up the Spoils, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Sammium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other People thereabout, to forsake the Roman Party, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Town that opened the Gates unto him, was Colla, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his Brother Mago to take in other places, He hastened into Campania. The general affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous losses sustained abroad in the Fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he used, unto such of them as became his Prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great Victory at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as fell many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had fought to deliver them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their Love with Gifts; pretending to admire their Valour; but seeking indeed, by all ways and means to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deal kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman Prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Estate; but being provoked by Injuries, fought to right himself and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should bear Sovereign Rule, not which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their Ransome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Noble Man of Carthage, and General of his Horse, to feel the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity, and could stoop unto desire of Peace. But with the Romans these Arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place.

conjoyed, as were any Iave the Lambs, changed on a sudden their Love into Hatred, without any other cause found, than change of Fortune.

Campania is the most goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the Country whereof it was Head, so great, fair, and wealthy, that it seemed no less convenient a Seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all Qualities, Bravery is the least requisite unto Sovereign Command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like Jays by their Feathers, despised the unfortunate Vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especial regard unto the Majesty of Rome, and could not endure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian Faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude, which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavrus, an ambitious Nobleman, whose Credit grew, and was upheld by furthering all popular desires: whereof the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their City to the Carthaginian, shortly after the Battel of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his Journey into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearness of the Roman Army, or some other fear of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual Rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any Articles of new Confederacy: or had leisure served, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant Love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle usage, and free dismissing of some Prisoners, in good account among them) unable to hold any such Negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and to meet him on the way with some of their Nobility, that should assure him of all faithful meaning; were driven to sit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new Friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own Cowardize. The People holding so tender a regard of Liberty, that even the lawful Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression, had now good cause to fear, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans, bring them under a more streight subjection than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into some Outrage Pacuvius made use of to serve his put themselves into many dangerous Councils, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a Guard of his own Followers about it, that none might enter nor issue forth without his leave; He called the People to assembly, and speaking as much ill of the Senate as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them that these wicked Governours were surprised by his Policy, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessary required, that they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearsing unto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their judgment was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of Death: Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, unprovided for such an Election, was silent; until at last, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, baseness, and insufficiency; or else, even because they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen (the fittest men to be substituted, having been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the People, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtless) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their Lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this, by all obsequiousness, to court the People, giving their Reins unto their lawless Will, who else were likely to cast them down: All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their Gates to Hannibal. But after the Battel at Canna, this impediment was removed, and few there were that would open their mouths to speak against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serve the Romans in the Isle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent unto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Fear. These whosoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in Spirit as in Followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented unto them, had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto he is said to have added a foolish Inveective, against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make Bridges of slaughtered Carcases, and to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in mind of their present strength: they having thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he diffused them, prouder than they came: and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, upon these Conditions: That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizen of theirs should be subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in War, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliver unto the Campans three Hundred Roman Prisoners, such as they themselves would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen opposed himself earnestly: using, in vain, many persuasions, to the wilful and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old Friends for new Acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and cut it in pieces, that, by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples, not far off, sent for Magius to come speak with him in the Camp. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon haisted himself towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the Walls too high, and was not well provided, to lay Siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great Solemnity and Pomp: all the People issuing forth of the Town, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many Noble Victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman Yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy, and Rome it self, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their Enemies; He prayed them, that they would not think him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State: and use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speak against him; being afflicted by Perella, the Son of Pacuvius. This Perella would have murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at Supper, the first night of his coming, had not his Fathers Authority kept him from making any such attempt. All the Town (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of Fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casertine, and Acerre, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their Walled Towns; but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it self was in extreme fear of Hannibal's coming, at the first report of the Overthrow at Cannae: and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate; that it much disturbed the Provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to flint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the Streets were full. Couriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went; whereof when Romans from the Consul Varrus had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous Superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive Two Men and Women, Gauls and Greeks, in their Ox-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions, we may justly think, that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Devil. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked Soothsayers; whose detestable Counsels they afterwards, for their own Honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire, with what Prayers and Supplications they might pacifie the Gods, and obtain an end of these Calamities. This is enough to discover the greenfears of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At the same time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor Octavius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africa. In these were contained News, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that wasted the Kingdom of Hieron, their good Friend and Confederate; and of another Fleet, riding among the Isles Ægætes, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside, to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, for he might name a Dictator, to take sovereignty charge of the Weal publick, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of People went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not depaired of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely, for up-holding the general Reputation. If his coming into the City, had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their Wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their Welcome, and Thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Livy would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his Head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller Offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and Z. Sempronius, Master of the Horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised Four new Legions, and a thousand Horse; though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very Boys. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten, in account of the Forces elevated by this Dictator; and Two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the Field, four new ones of Prætorians, or Striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy Slaves, that were put in hope of Liberty, if they should deserve it by manifold Service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever owed Money, and could not pay it, or had committed any capital Offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arm these Companies, they were fain to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the Spoils of their Enemies that had been there set up: among which were fix thousand Armour of the Gauls, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent Oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own Gates, in the habit of Strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the Prisoners taken at Cannae, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere Night out of the Roman Territory. To the Messengers of the Captives, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor Kins-folk, but the great need wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their Suit; which yet they obtained not. Besides the general custom of the Romans

(held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken Prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the Enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these poor men, to say, that their Offence was no greater than the Conflicts: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted Money; and therefore could not want Excuses, whereby to avoid the disburment: whether it were fo, or not; that any such Plea was held about this matter of Redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the Slaves which were armed for the War, are said to have cost more than the Sum did amount unto, for that would have ransomed the Prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman Proceedings, as if they had been severe, when as indeed they were fuitable to the present fortune, poor, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proof, That Hannibal valued those Roman Slaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters, at no more than every one the third part of a common Souldiers Ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for Slaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withhold consider, that these private men did only lend these Slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) until the War should be ended. If Hannibal would have given fix long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for ready Money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like authority, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used towards the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battel. These were charged, for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call ragione dello Stato may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driven to a miserable Exigent, is fain to help it self, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Cannae, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or else were fifty years of Age; but until this War should be ended, how long soever it lasted, and without reward. The same chittry sentence, was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehaviour: but never upon any man of Quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cassius Metellus, and a few other hair-brained Fools his Companions; who being frightened out of their Wits, with the terror of so great a loss, were desiring, after the Battel, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigorous grew shortly distastful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; Liv. l. 2. nevertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no less apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needful business within the City, took the Field with with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans in their weak estate, only Marcellus had the Honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofia with a Fleet, ready to set Sail for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his Ships, and Fifteen Hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which Forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africa. But hearing of the Overthrow at Cannæ, he sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Campaniam: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians), to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward, and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle Walks Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by fair Words, and terrible Threats, the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with the least touch of disloyalty: it had also a sure Haven; whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the Field: which if he laid waste, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private Want or Poverty, but a great desire to gratify the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chief: a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, half dead at Cannæ, and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his Wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in Honour, to return the greatest thanks he could unto so courteous an Enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie Nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personal Valour, he made this Bantius so far in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he took by composition, and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beset, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the Enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make these of a meaning to force the Town; which he fought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the Night-time there passed Messages between him and the Citizens his parakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his Forces, could be trained into the Field, the Multitude within the Town should presently rise; and seizing upon the Gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the City, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the Walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away betwixt. Wherefore ordering his Men in three Companies, within three several Gates looking towards the Enemy: He gave a freight command, that all the Citizens should keep their Houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the Enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the Walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he had his Men bring Ladders, and make ready for the Assault; which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very Walls, and thought nothing less, than that the Romans would meet them in the Field: suddenly the middle Gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, break forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected Sally the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him; the other two Gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new-levised Companies, upon the Enemies backs. The sudden terror was more available unto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a Victory, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that War; inasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his Enemies that were departed, took a strict account of the Citizens of Nola: condemning above three score, and ten of High Treason, whose Heads he struck off; and so leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the mean season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no Wisdom to lose time in periwations, but laid Siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by Night, and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing News of the Dictator, that he was about Capua, thither went Hannibal: as being unwilling, that an Enemy so near should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late Victory of Marcellus, had nothing abated the Spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army, seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his Men, at the most, and those not slain in plain Battle, but by a sudden eruption; winneth chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as own Citizens; to hear, That in a Skirmish with good News, to hear, That in a Skirmish not far from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not restless. At Capua the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italian Confederates but many Companies of Italian Confederates but many Companies of Italian Confederates were gotten into the Town, and held of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held of Rome. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and above four hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battle of Cannæ, being sent by their several States to the Camp: whither whilst they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them back sorrowful; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose Government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Capua, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard News from Capua. How that great City became the King-leader of all the Campanians into Rebellion. The people of Capua were affected as they of Cannæ; and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many Trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a Night, and fortified the Wessera part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulsurnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Capua were; as the rest of the Campanians, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place winneth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountered with greater Forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers Assaults he gave, but was still repelled with loss; and many Sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the Horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River, who had found him relieved Capua, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome, about some matters of Religion, had given him express charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus, from Suessula could not come, his way being stopped by the over-flowings of Vulsurnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanians, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the Water stayed his journey, such Entreaties were needless. Neither is it like, that the Dictator carried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Capua. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the Siege. Barrels of Corn were sent by Night, floating down the River: and when some of these, being carried away by an Eddy of the Water, stuck among the Willows on the Bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged Men. At length, when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallies; the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground: whereon the besieged presently fowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their Patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Capua until the Rapes were grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their Obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent Ransom, which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven Hundred Carthaginians he placed in Capua, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanians; unto whom he restored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their Virtue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prænestis: which is no weak proof of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This Siege of Capua was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For Winter overtook him, long before he could dispatch the business: which how to quit with his Honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he Wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though effeminate as it was, He therewithal did often bear the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

Of the great Supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal in Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloath or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partial they were in their Writings.

When Mago, the Son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the Battle at Cannæ; his Brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyful message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his Brother had fought; what Confils he had chased, wounded, or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former War never flunished any occasion of Fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to Battle; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand Prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucians, and other

People of Italy, that following the fortune of those great Victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief seat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his Brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that Winter, attending their supply. As for the War, he said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repair their broken Forces. He willed them to consider, that the War was far from home, in the Enemies Country; that so many Battels had much diminished his Brothers Army; that the Soldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian Friends, with exactions of Money, Corn, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage: which the Victory would requite with large amends. Finally he caused the golden Rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three buffels, or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, forasmuch as none but the principal of that Order, were accustomed to wear that Ornament.

* This Li- ty reports it, and credi- ble it is, that while Rome was poor, the full advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the Errand of Adgo found extraordinary welcom. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perfwader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the Gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formal Answer, which Livy puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans, and putting them in mind of his own shameful overthrow received at the Islands Agates: yet the sum of his speech appears to have been no less malicious, than it is set down, forasmuch as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barbians, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruins of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these Victories, as is reported; saying, It ill befitted him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more help, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their Camp, filled forthwith with spoils, to make request for Meat and Money. To these Cavils, if Answer were needful, it might be said, That other booty than of Horses and Slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the best of the Soldiers carrying no other wealth into the Field, than a few silver Studs in the Bridles and Trappings of their Horses. If Hannibal had taken any main Convoy of Money and Provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Province, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to have done, when they were the Camp of Adrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have been made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oracion, and where in he best might hope to prevail, contained a persuasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek Peace, whilst they had so much the better in War.

What would have been the issue of this counsel, if it had been followed, it were not easy to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of War, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shameful overthrows; since after this War ended, and a new League concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruin, longer than until such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other Wars. This counsel therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very petulant; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of Silver, should be lent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Province, but to be transported into Italy.

This great aid, had it been as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the wretched improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannae to Rome, or in retreating his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finished the business, with less dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanians, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following War. But either the too much carelessness of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extrem necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than sense of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set down. The Elephants were sent: and some money peradventure; uncertain it is, how long after. But those great Forces of three score thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by Time, and sundry accidents of War. Only some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Adrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great Riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their Subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the War of the Mercenaries; and the perfidious Tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expense of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of Peace, after the loss at Agates. Yet

Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on Foot, are appointed to the service in Italy; and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to, have extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit, even for the price of those Slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage, in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all Parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrry their Mother City in the bottom of the freights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground; and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome would leave to them it self, in the destruction of Carthage: the impudence of Roman falsehood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would again rebel. For the Carthaginians, having given up Hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoined them, with condition that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their Weapons, and Engines of War; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the Body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withal, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other Place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduring men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though figured with glowing words, plainly shews, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the halty growth of Carthage in Riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I think; and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present Wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these Times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering Wealth, were more industrious and skillful than the Romans; so came they far short of them, in the honourable care of the publick good; having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them, (besides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the War strongly, was over-past, go more lazily to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easy for Hanno to persuade the covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; so going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wilidom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of Fortune, against the Enemies; or (which perhaps were works) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could do so) finished the War, might easily make Hanno a King, and subdue Carthage, with the Forces that he had given them to the Conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own Slackness, Incredulity, dulness, or Negligence, the Carthaginians were perfwaded rather to make small disturbances in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet might live so large extent, and so open a Coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy, especially the affection of the Naturals (being as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intendment against Rome it self, until such time as every little Thorn were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province: then must Emporia have been besieged and forced: which by reason of Alliance with the Masilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the Town of Emporia was too strong to be won in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of Wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Town of the same Name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Grecians, though not over-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a work of little less difficulty, than was the Roman War (in appearance) after the Battle at Cannae: yea it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the War; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgment, near unto the Gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt being such, as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong War up on their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africa, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the War, transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private Affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than it is necessary to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at Opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious Wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the Purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the Noble House of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of their Barbians had been somewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the People of Rome: not only in Goverment of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weal publick above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman War was finished: so the conclusion of this War present, will make them complain, with feeling Sighs, of their Negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the Victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the Opportunity, that now they let pass, as if it were coit enough to send a few Handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the State of Affrick it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon success of things in Italy; the course of Actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governors, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set down. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livy, the tender love of his own Country, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, believe those lies, which the unpartial judgment of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them Original. It was needfess to rehearse all that may be found in

Pol. lib. 1. Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One Example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former War, That having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the Life of Amilcar, set down by Æmilius Probus. That Eryx was in fact, for held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any War. These Words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian Soldiers, and the singular Vertue of their General infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not over-liberal. For in the Treaty of Peace between Amilcar and Catalus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their Arms, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he would not talk of any Composition: Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talk of it, or no; for that the Arms which his Country had put into his hands to use against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yield up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custom upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his Will, and not to stand with him upon point of Honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who statly, and by Name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; saying, that howsoever Amilcar, and his Soldiers, had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman Story) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livy introduceth Hannibal, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful Oppression, &c. verthowr on the Islands * Agæates, with the great services of Amilcar at Cannæ, as if both of them had had a like event; yet * elsewhere he forbear-eth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his Mouth, making him say, That the Affairs of Carthage were never better, than a little before the loss of their Fleet in that Battel at Sea: wherein himself was General. Now concerning the doings of the Scipio in Spain, there is cause to wily, that this Fabius, with Val. Antiat, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livy to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their Relations: which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman Victories in Spain, before Adrubal, the Son of Amilcar, followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

It hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, sent before him his brother Cnæus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thousand Foot of the Confederates, and twelve thousand Horie, had been allotted unto this Consul, therewith to make War in Spain against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of these his own Forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himself remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spain, by the Senate, with an Army of Eight thousand Men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many Battels, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, how the Enemy could so often find means to repair his Forces, and return strong into the Field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Countrey from the Tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African Yoke, and durst adventure to break it: so the ancient Reputation of the first Conquerors, might serve to arm the Naturals against these Invaders; and to reclaim those, that had revolted unto the Romans; were it only by the memory of such ill success, as the like Rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Soldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poor, and Gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their Children, Kinsmen, and Friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Affrick. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it; the Victories of the Scipio were neither so many, nor so great; as they are set out by Livy. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captain Fabius, or Livy in his person, maketh an Objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livy for him, doth answer. That if Adrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Adrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of a Battel, save only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his Money, Elephants, and broken Troops, over Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than threecore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most inconvenient for his Retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his Money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the last Battel between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian Records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us: unto whom it were no Wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven-Town not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same Name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his Clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the Story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his Clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a mean stranger, and having no Jurisdiction in the Countrey. Yet is it certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practise had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other Errand, than setting them at liberty. This Pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with Money; and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially, when he had won a Battel against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord made with these People, likely it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgot, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiors; Majeftatem Pop. Rom. comitor conseruent, which is, as Tully interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became diuina Romana of the Roman Jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguntians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them flart from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and Pyæ, the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Countrey unto Hanno and his Heirs.) He made him not only Lieutenant General over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferior Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno, at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoice at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joy; it being the custom of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Napeletians, and Milanens, in the Age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as some feasible fill of the present evil which they felt, than regardful of the greater mischief, wherinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to tamperize. Ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which it is like, that some Forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a Battel with Scipio; wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this Victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Town hard by, and wan it. But Adrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand Foot and a thousand Horie, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far about Tarraco, whom he found careless, as after a Victory, roving abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter drove them aboard their Ships. This done, he ran up into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Illegates from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aid his Fleet: where having fed things in order, he returned back, and made toward Adrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Illegates were compelled by force, having lost Albanania, their chief City, to pay a Fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Lucetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town; which they defended thirty days; hoping in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yield: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of Silver. During the Siege, the Lucetani came to help their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lucetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily diuina Romana; subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold War against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Adrubal, as it were by a Chann, stirred up the Illegates, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Arms in his Quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Publius perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Countrey, was beaten by Adrubal back to his Ships, whence

* Agæates, Eryx, or Sicily, the place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful Oppression, &c. verthowr on the Islands * Agæates, with the great services of Amilcar at Cannæ, as if both of them had had a like event; yet * elsewhere he forbear-whence he durst not stir, until Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wan, by returning upon them, unlooked for, through a deep Snow. As for the Lacertans, Illygetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they fought their own benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon kinds of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous Tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, heartening again unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Laws, and not under Governors sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanor in all Ages following may testify: even from henceforth unto the days of Augustus Cæsar; till when they were never thoroughly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a Victory against the Carthaginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their Ships, that ran not too far on ground, he took, and thereby grew Master of the whole Coast: landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this Victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, and given Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to fly into the utmost corners of the Land, and hide himself in Lusitania. Yet it follows; that the Illygetes did again rebel; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberia, and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Illygetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his Subjects and had given him Hostages. These took from the Carthaginian three Towns, and vanquished him in two Battels, wherein they slew fifteen thousand of his Men, and took four thousand Prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two Brethren jointly administered the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian War, the two Scipio's did, hand cunctanter, without fear or doubt, pass over Iberia, and besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper Forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bolser, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be perfwaded by one Aciduss a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely restoring unto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their Faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this Message and Restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perfwading them, as he had done Bolser, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much Love: if the Tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere it we find, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can believe no less. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their Forces: Cn. makes War by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse out of Africa: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Masters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans, because they had been chidden the last year for their Negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of these Ship-Masters animates to Rebellion the Carpestians, or Carpetani, an In-land People about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief, to that Asdrubal is fain to make a Journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them that were found scattered abroad in the Fields. But they making head, so valiantly assail him, that they drive him, for very fear, to incamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground, whence he dares not come forth to give them Battle. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his Provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good success breeds negligence, for which they dearly pay: Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest, so that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his Letters in what hard case he was, and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported, and that upon the very rumour of this Journey, almost all Spain was already to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or if they will needs have it so, that then they must find him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ, they should find work more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; and Himilco, with such Forces as are thought expedient for that Service, both by Land and Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself with store of Money, that he might have wherewithal to win the Friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must pass, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he lays great impositions upon all the Spaniards his Subjects: and having gotten together as much Treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberia. The Scipio's hearing these news, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest Town in all those Quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a Battle with him: which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his Followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the Victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slain, and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away, ere the Battels were thoroughly joyned. Their Camp the Romans take and spoil: whereby (questionless) they are marvelously enriched; all the Money that could be raked together in Spain, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This day even joyns all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping him-

himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they have neither Money, Apparel, nor Bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting, so as unless they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their Forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evil season, the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Cannæ, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent, how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that Love and Care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think; that remember the last news of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his own safety? They find him, and Mago, and Amilcar, the Son of Bomilcar, with an Army of threecore thousand Men, besieging Iliturgi: (which the learned Orelius, and others, probably conjecture to have stood, where Carmona is now, in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Iliturgi afterward called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Illygetes, their nearest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of Victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and having victualled the place, encourage the Townsmen to defend their Walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threecore thousand: and killing more of the Enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one, out of his quarters; and took that day, besides Prisoners and other Booty, fifty and eight Ensigns. The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Iliturgi, fall upon Incibit, that stood a little Soutwards from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning Money by War, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered whence the Carthaginians had Money to pay them; since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting Money of his own; and being beaten in this journey, had lost his wealthy Carriages, when his Camp was taken after the Battle by Ibera. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are Beaten again at Incibit: where there were of them above thirt-

teen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous Victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Novum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incamped: and stores the place with Victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian Horse have charged the Romans in their March, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in March, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoefull, to retire unto some place more assured. So P. withdraws himself unto Mons Vitiæ: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibit, overlooks the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal, the Son of Gefeo, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the Enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Cassulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a Wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Betis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus, to besiege Iliturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman Garrison; hoping to win it by Famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the Rebellion of Cassulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two Battels kills above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them Prisoners, with fix and thirty Ensigns. This Victory (doubtless) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that Siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great Battle fought; that lasted four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable Victory; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand Prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians fly to Astorgis; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the Field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians again: but kills not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these Overthrows, the Spaniards, a people framed even by Nature to set War on foot, quickly fell up the broken Troops of Asdrubal: who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again, and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensigns, and other Appurtenances. After so many Victories, the Romans are even ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entered into this War. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having so long forbore to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the present they win Saguntum, and restore the possession thereof unto this of the poor dispersed Citizens, as they can find out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had mislaid unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last Action (questionless) was much to their Honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them, if they had been able.

But over-looking now this long continuance of great Victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, either print or token of all their brave Exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Adrubal's journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporie, an Haven-Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Plebeians, kin to the Mallians, friends to the Romans; They have easily won to their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unfeigned passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession; who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprise: which is to be suspected, since in this Action we find no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable Fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those Battels lately remembered, after every one of which Adrubal fate down before some place that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custom of Armies vanquished, to carry the War from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortify themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the Field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians, the next adjoining People. Yet made they this, a little less than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we hear before, That they have yielded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their Faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made War against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without express condition of a great sum, hired to serve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; unless perhaps in those days it were the Roman custom, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Livy follows, to call every Messenger, or Stragler, that entered their Camp, an Hostage of that People from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, fired with great Rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to help the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Countrymen that follow Hannibal in his Wars. But if any of these three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such news of the Riches and Welfare of Hannibal's Men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow Adrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when these Mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the Field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this access of strength, divide their forces, and seek out the Enemies; who lie not far off with three Armies. Adrubal, the Son of Amilcar, is nearest at hand: even among the Celtiberians, at Antevia. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed, Mago, and Adrubal, the Son of Gisco, hearing the news, will make use of their distance, which is five days March, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Soldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Adrubal, the son of Gisco, are not studying how to run away: they find no such necessity. They join their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himself most well assured. Especially he is vexed by Malcanila, Prince of the Mallians, Numidians bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chief Honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suesetani, to join with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be freight shut up, and besieged, He flies forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way; leaving T. Fonteius, his Lieutenant, with a small Company, to defend the Camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The Fight continues so long, that the Numidian Horse appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come so fast upon him in Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting, and animating his Men, where need most required, is struck through with a Lance, and slain: very few of his Army escaping the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio, within nine and twenty days after. At his meeting with Adrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had War in their own Country. If Antevia, where Adrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Barro takes it, a Celtiberian Town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Adrubal, and easily persuaded to take as much Money for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them; and no less unable, without their help, either to resist the Enemy, or to join with his Brother, makes a very violent Retreat; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Adrubal presseth hard upon him: and Mago, with Adrubal, the Son of Gisco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steals from them all, by night; but is overtaken the next day by their Horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of his Legions against such

Enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds, of ease afforded on every side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliade. The weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that having themselves, I know not how, within some Woods adjoining, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before said. It is a terrible Overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and throw themselves within Woods adjoining, I should much wonder, did not a greater Miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North side of Iberus, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his General, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Marius, a young Roman Gentleman, of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Soldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Soldiers, being to choose a General by most voices, prefer this L. Marius before Fonteius, the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Adrubal, the Son of Gisco, coming upon them; this L. Marius fo encourage his Men, (singly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable Victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely founds the Retreat; reserving the fury of his Soldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in Enemies lately vanquished, and now again little better than taken: But when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former security; and utterly despising him, let neither Corpus ducard, nor Sentinel, but rest secure, as if no Enemy were near. Marius therefore animates his Soldiers with lively words, and tells them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being undertaken. They are soon persuaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and seals upon the Camp of Adrubal: where finding no Guard, but the Enemies fast asleep, or very drowsy, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All pages out of their Camp, Marius hath preposited, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart: which as many do as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Adrubal, the Son of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Marius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath beset a Roman Cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But left perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Marius hastens to them as soon as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning upon this further Camp: which with no great difficulty he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman Shields, foul, and bloodied with their former Execution. He drives headlong into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the Sword. Thirty seven thousand of the Enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, that are taken Prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain: and that in another Battel with Adrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty taken Prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livy therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in Battels. That, whilst Marius was making an Orator to his Soldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livy reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Marius got a great name; which he might well do, if with so small forces, and in such distress, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these Occurrences L. Marius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but letting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, He filed himself Proprietor. The Fathers were no less moved with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore took such careful order, for supplying their Forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies, leaved to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the City itself, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for that title of Proprietor, which Marius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Soldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman Foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the Affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the Victories of Marius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Marius and Fonteius; he found firmer tokens of the Overthrows received, than of those miraculous Victories, whereof Marius had made his Vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Adrubal, the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lepides arvi; out of which there was no issue, but only through a freight, whereon the Roman seized at his first coming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Adrubal, seeing himself thus locked up, made offer to depart forth with out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition, that he and his Army might be thence dismissed; That he spent many days in entertaining Parley with Claudius about this business. That night by night he conveyed his Foot-men (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the Foot-men could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the Conditions offered for their late departure, to have been of far less value. However it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain; or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Soldiers, which had chosen Martin their Proprietor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deeds, had repealed their Election, and sent a Proprietor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needful to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved Memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same Family. Whether upon these, or upon other Reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province, and Publius the Son of P. Scipio, sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the War into Africa: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty; and other Virtues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenor of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too much of the great Alexander's Vanity; How he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have been one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entering her chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than meer Fables, devised by Historians, who sought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seem, not only to have surpassed other Nations in virtue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when of the Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on an high place, where he might be seen of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the Victories of L. Marius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Proprietor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal, the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the too partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insit.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joynted M. Junius Sillanus, as Proprietor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, in thirty Quinquagena Gallie. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarraco along the Sea-coast. At the same time Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him from all quarters of the Province, which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful Opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the less they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next year) he did nothing, but spent the time perhaps, as his forefathers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against New Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, his Sea-forces assisting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea; and wan it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fishermen of Tarraco had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the Walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of New Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demy-Iland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the Walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake, which the Fishermen of Tarraco had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelf, whereon at low water men might pass knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thrust threinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the Walls without resistance: the place being left without Guard, as able to defend itself by the natural strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City; easily forced a Gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. War booty was found within the Town, Scipio himself cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of Riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury; we may easily perceive, how how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africa and Spain, was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtesy; restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two petty Kings of the Illyrgetes and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarraco, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joynted with the Romans. The Speech of Indibilis, King of the Illyrgetes, is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly Fugitives use, of the pleasure which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians; and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Illyrgetes had ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the fame, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans never Masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, wan unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loss, were very sorry; yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, having stoln a Town by surprise, was too far transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busy, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook New Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, fate down before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the Son of Gefeo, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio at work, in that lingering War of taking and retaking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian Forces, under Asdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, went to a greater Enterprise; even to fight in trial of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whether he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the Name of Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal; his Vancourers charged so lustily the Carthaginian Horse, that they drove them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that final piece of service, how full of Spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore-side; by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whercon he strongly incamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he descended more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazard of a Battle, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain; up into his Camp on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drove both Men and Elephants head-long. I know not whether: for it is said, that there was no way to fly. Out of such a Battle, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed Troops, to have marched towards the Pyrenes, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless Mago, and Asdrubal, the Son of Gefeo, are reported after this, to have conspired with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the Name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs, have too long detained us.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumus, the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip, King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans, joining with the Aetolians, make War upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage, of such mighty aid, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans Corn into his own Barns, and to drive away their Cattel to Geryon: his Victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open Field. He might perhaps have forced some walled Towns, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannae: but had he spent much time about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, until Corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome after his Victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming; want of Victuals would have compelled him to quit the Enterprize. Yea many of the People that opened so hastily their Gates unto him, upon the first bruit of his glorious success, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the Event of another Battle: if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessities to continue a Siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the Walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened Reputation, somewhat later in the year; in which time to force their obedience was wanting, unless they would freely yield it. But this great part of the care and travel was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old Enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay Siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty Forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply, there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above Thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alpes, had been lost in his journey through the Masses of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this excused negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his Friends, they told him truly, what the Mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to pass along through Spain and Gaul, as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needful Provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfy his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, he took the Field: and having finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himself Master of some good Haven-Town thereabout, that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet; or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to do what else was needful, he sent Himilco unto the Leontines, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assuage all quarters of Italy, yea the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia; since the Siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or over-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slew above Two thousand of his Men, with the loss of fewer than Three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Brutians, his good Friends, he won Petelia, or Peitia, by force; after it had held out some Months. He was likewise Consentia, and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Alto

the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over-against Sicily.

The great Faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good Government, under which the Roman Subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnestness in Rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Sovereignty, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or benefit ally. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did fend to Rome for help: where their Messengers received answer from the Senate, That the public Misfortunes had not left means to relieve their Afflictions (Embassadors they are termed, as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman Subjection, that had a private Jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible in defence of the Town against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having thoroughly considered all their Forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadors were willing to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety; as having already discharged their Faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some Months; and having striven in vain to defend themselves, there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloody Victory over them; being vanquished as much by Famine, as by any violence of the Assaults.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them into terms of great Extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their loss at Cannæ; they had shewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithstanding the great War that lay upon them so near at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their Fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Pretor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaul; to the Illyrian King, Pneus, they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the payment was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip, King of Macedon, they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Phloris, their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus, with all his Army, was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce Ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Luma, through which he was to pass. Against his coming, the Enemies had fawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Army, was entered into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, began to cast down the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all down to fast, that the Romans were were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work, of fawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some wind, that might have blown all down before the Romans entered, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject, I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done; and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies Sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lausardy, a Country now so civil, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumus his skull, being cleaned, and trimmed up with Gold, a drinking Cup was made, and consecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy Vessel, for the use of the Priest in their Solemnities. Of this great overthrow when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no less than the calamity. But Sorrow could give no remedy to the Mischiefs: and Anger was vain, where there wanted Forces to revenge. Tribute from there wanted Force came none: neither do I find, that any was a second time demanded: this we find. That with Plenatus, and Scordileus, the Illyrian Kings; as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; increasing their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, he sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a League, upon these conditions; That the King in Person should come into Italy, and with all his Forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman War, until it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the Spoil therein to be gotten, should be left intire unto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army, should pass into Greece, and there assist Philip, until he had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving seemingly unto him the full possession of that Country, and the Isles adjoining. But such pre-disposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the Divine Providence, which therein shews it self not (as Herodotus fally terms it, and like an Ætkeiff) envious or malicious, but very just and majestic, in upholding that unpeakable greatness of Sovereignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold Lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These news were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted; and friendly dismissed, with Guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell willingly into the Camp of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the business, about which they came, upon the points before remembered. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be defrined by the Roman Fleet; which, mistaking them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chase. They did their best to have escaped; but being overtaken, they suffered the Lie that once had served them, to fail it again. That having been sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius, the Pretor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. Their Tale was now less credible than before: and (which marred all) Gelyes, Beller, and Algo, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal, to ratifie the Agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to find all out: so that at length Hannibal's own Letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole business confessed. The Embassadors, and their followers, were sent clove Prisoners to Rome: where the chief of them were cast into Prison, and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their Ships that escaped, carried word unto Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassy was sent, that went and returned with betterer speed; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some loss of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian War, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble resolution; and suitable unto that, whereby they kept off the storm, that else would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more easie, with small Forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And here they were in the right. For that the very Reputation of a King of Macedon, joining with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegiance not only of the Latines, and other their most faithful Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all Privileges of the City, it will appear by the following success of things. M. Valerius, the Pretor, with Twenty Quinquageme Gallies, was appointed to attend the Macedonian: and to let on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begun. Philip was bused about the Sea-Towns, that looked towards Italy, sitting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum, which he wan, and so returned to Apollonia again. The Egyptians craved help of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kind Offers, who had none other business to do. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townfmen in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily re-gained the Town, and sent thence a Thousand Men, under Nerius Crispus, an undertaking and expert Captain; which got by night into Apollonia. There made a notable Sally; and break into Philip's Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his Camp, and raise the Siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence soon, but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River; so that he was fain to burn his Ships, (which be like were were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation always Enemy to the Crown of Macedon: and easily perfwaded them (being fo affected, as hath elfe where been fhewed) to make ftrmg War on Philip; wherein he promifed them great affiftance from the Romans. That which moft moved the troublefome Spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promife, as if already it had been his own. So a League was made between them: and afterward folemnly publifhed at Olympia, by the Ætolians, and by the Romans in their Capitul. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which fpace Acarnania was contained, all the Country fhould be fubdued, and left unto the Ætolians; the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it fhould be with Provifion, to hold no longer, than whilst he abftained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Affociates. This was indeed the only point, whereto Valerius aimed: who promifed as much on the Romans behalf; That they fhould not make peace with the Macedonian; unlefs it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to thofe that had made or favoured the fide of Cleomenes againft the Macedonian, to enter at their pleafure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Serdaites: the firft of which reigned at Pergamus, in Afia the lefs, a Prince hereafter much to be fpoken of; the other two held fome part of Myfia, about which the Romans were fo far from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of thefe Affociates, are thruft into the Treaty; rather to give it countenance, than for any readinefs which they difclofe to enter therein. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dymachus, and others, are yet a while the only men, of whom the Roman Generals muft make much; as the late French King, Henry the Fourth, when he had only the title of Nauarre, was fain to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of War upon the Myrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger, to infect the Kingdom of Macedon; wafted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia; and over-running the Pelagians, Dardaniens, and others, whom he held fufpected, came down into Theffaly, whence he made thence as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, he thought to ftr up all the Greeks adjoining, againft the Ætolians, whom they generally detefted as a neft of Robbers, troublefome to all the Country. To which purpofe, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, he left Perfus, his Son and Heir, with four thoufand men, upon their borders: with the reft of his Army, before greater bufinefs fhould overtake and entangle him, he made a long journey into Thrace, againft a people called the Medes: that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whensoever the King was abfent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againft the Acarnanians, in hope to fubdue thofe their daily Enemies, and win their little Country, ere he fhould be able to return.

Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniade and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently fituated to let in an Army, and configned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the ftout refolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we fay) every Mothers fon of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great hafte of the Macedonian (who laid afide all other bufinefs) to fuccour thefe his friends; caufed the Ætolians to forfake their Enterprife. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Antioche, which they took: the Romans affailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the fpoil.

For thefe good fervices M. Valerius was chofen Conful at Rome; and P. Sulpicius fent in his ftead, to keep the War on foot in Greece. But befides the Roman help, Attalus, out of Afia, came over to affift the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved, by his own jealoufie of Philip's greatness: though fomewhat alfo tickled with the vanity, of being chofen by the Ætolians their principal Magiftrate; which honour, though no better than a regular, he took in very loving part. Againft the Forces which Attalus and the Romans had fent, being joined with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two batels: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon thefe his troublefome Neighbours defired peace of him; and ufed their beft means to get it. But when the day, appointed for the confufion thereof, was come; their Embaffadors, inftead of making fubmiffion, propofed unto him fuch intollerable conditions, as ill befecmed vanquifhed men to offer; and might therefore well reftifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being befieged in their own Towns, that had made them defirous of compofition. This fear being taken away, by the Encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever: and thruft a Garriſon of their own, and ſome Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Accha, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the ftreight from Naupactus, wafted the Country in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip required them; coming upon them in hafte from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them falter away, but nothing richer than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prufias, King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lefs than Attalus held fufpected the power of Philip; ſent a Navy into Greece, to affift the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reafon; as being more intereſſed in the fuccels of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man fome two hundred Ships; yet the Veffels were ſuch, as could not hold out againft the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to ufe the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came ſomewhat too late: which might better at firft have kept thofe Enemies from laſting upon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could ſerve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needful that he ſhould correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the *Accha*ians his principal Confederates. But in affailing their Town, he was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman Garriſon; which drove him back with ſome lofs.

In ſuch caſes, eſpecially where God is intended a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his Retreat from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his perſonal Valour, in fighting well on foot, when his Horſe was ſlain under him. He had alſo ſoon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thouſand; with ſome twenty thouſand Head of Cattel, which they had brought together into a place of ſafety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his purſuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his Horſe running haſtily under a low Tree, had torn off one of the Horns, which (after the faſhion of thoſe times) the King wore in his Creſt. This was gathered up by an Ætolian; who carried it home, and ſhewed it as a token of Philip's death. The Horn was well known, and the Tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but ſome Captains of Philip, eaſily corrupted; who thinking to make themſelves a fortune in that change of things, ran into ſuch Treafon, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuſe. Hereupon the King returned home; leaving not three thouſand men to affift his friends the *Accha*ians. He alſo took order, to have Beacons erected, that might give him notice of the Enemies doings; upon whom he meant ſhortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his preference quickly eſtabliſhed. But in Greece all went ill-favourably; eſpecially in the life of Eubæa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it; where alſo the ſtrong City of Chalcis was likely to have been loſt, if he had not come the ſooner. He made ſuch haſty Marches, that he had almoſt taken Attalus in the City of Opus. This City, lying over-againſt Eubæa, Attalus had won, more through the cowardize of the People, than any great force that he had uſed. Now becauſe the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the ſack of Oreum, and taken all to themſelves: it was agreed, that Attalus ſhould make his beſt profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his ſharers. But whilst he was buſie, in drawing as much Money as he could out of the Citizens: the fudden tidings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Sea-fide, where he got aboard his Ships; finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this miſadventure; or tidings of Prufias the Bithynian his invaſion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without ſtaying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus; won Torone, Tricones, Drymus, and many ſmall Towns in thoſe parts; performing likewiſe ſome Actions, of more bravery than importance, againſt the Ætolians. In the mean ſeaſon, Macchidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been buſie in Peloponneſus; but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his Death in Egypt, went about to chooſe two new Kings; and to conform themſelves to their old manner of Government. But their Eſtate was ſo far out of tune, that their hope of redreſſing things within the City, proved no lefs unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large Dominion abroad. Lycurgus, a Tyrant, roſe up among them: unto whom ſucceeded this Macchidas; and ſhortly after came Nabis, that was worſe than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman fide, for fear of the *Accha*ians; that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedæmonian. But of theſe we ſhall ſpeak more hereafter.

Philip entering into Acchia, and ſeeing his preference had brought the contentment of affurance to that Country; ſpoke brave words to the Affembly of their States, ſaying, That he had to do with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Acchia: but could no where find them; ſuch hafte they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he ſaid, was not always prosperous: he ſhould one day light upon them; as ere this his ſundry times had done, and ſtill to their loſs. The *Acchia*ians were glad to hear theſe words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he reſorted unto their Nation ſome Towns, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewiſe to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had been taken by the Romans, and ſold for ſlaves, he fought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet poſſeſſion of their own City. Further, paſſing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians: whom he drove into the Mountains and Woods, or other their ſtrongelt holds; and waited their Country. This done, he took leave of the *Accha*ians: and returning home by Sea, viſited the people that were his Subjects, or dependants; and animated them ſo well, that they reſted fearleſs of any threatening danger. Then had he leiſure to make War upon the Dardaniens, ſix Neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not ſo far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himſelf Maſter of the Sea; the Romans (ſince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or purſue him, when he lately ran along the coaſt of Greece, faſt by them where they lay.

This good ſuccels added much Reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make ſtrmg War upon the Ætolians, at their own doors. As for the Romans; either ſome diſpleaſure, conceived againſt their Confederates; or ſome fear of danger at home, when Aſdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy; cauſed them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driven to great extremity, were fain to ſue for peace unto Philip, and accept it, upon whatever conditions it beſt pleaſed him. The agreement was no ſooner made, than P. Sempromius with ten thouſand Foot, a thouſand Horſe, and thirty five Gallies, came over in great hafte (though ſomewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aſide to Dyrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noiſe, as if with theſe his own Forces he would work Wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to viſit him; and found him tame enough. The King preſented him Batrel: but he reſuſed it; and ſuffering the Macedonians to waſte the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himſelf cloſe within the Walls of Apollonia; making ſome Overtures of Peace: which cauſed Philip to great cauſe to be diſpleaſed with the Ætolians; as had Philip, to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royal offer that he made them, to ſerve their turn in Italy, and afflict them in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any Fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Only once they came to his help, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing; and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his own Navy, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This wretched dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno's Tricks; whereof Hannibal too bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to hear that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Morarchs, and alter the affairs of the World at his pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Envy could suggest, to persuade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian Wars so mighty a Prince, whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes, by making many promises of sending a Fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serve to terrify the Romans, and compel them to send part of their Forces from home; that might find this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the War, be urged unto the prosecution by his own necessity, putting the Carthaginians to give him no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of living him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy, should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfil his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impatient, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsel of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; even in that little courtesy which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he begun the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereof his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithless promises. When therefore the *Ætoli*ans had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him; with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the War, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had willfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they deceived him, as if the quarrel were merely his own, and he unable to manage it. The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by mediation of the Egyptians, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered in this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonians; and therefore perhaps inferred into the Covenant, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the *Ætoli*ans were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their loss.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias, King of Bithynia, the Acheans, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Egyptians. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus, King of Perge; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Elani, Messenians, and Athenians. The *Ætoli*ans were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Elani and Messenians, followers of the *Ætoli*ans, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inferred by the Romans; that were never slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians, they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting down of their name in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a buſſe people, and ministered occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble Affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Commonwealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprizes at once, they followed all by the halves; and wasted more Men and Money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole War, in far shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This Error had been the less harmful, if their care of Italy had been such as it ought. But they sacrificed Hannibal, to weary himself with expectations of their promised Supplies: which being still deferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conqueror could have desired. The Death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaul; the begun Rebellion of the Sardinians; the Death of Hiero, their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily; as also that War, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon, happening all at one time; time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of the Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the Forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to perform all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care, and required their several Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian War; should have been strengthened, whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troops, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the War in Spain; the lingering aid which they sent, to uphold the Sardinian Rebellion, when it was already well near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these attempts) their hasty catching at Sicily: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the main point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed, than by making supposition. That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatness, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to Necessity, to feed his Italian friends with hopes, and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard Siege, that was to be reserved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola; but always with bad success. Once Marcellus fought a Battel with him there: yet under the very Walls of the Town; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better acquainted to the Roman side, since the Heads, that inclined them to Rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that Fight lost: which was no great marvel; his Forces being then divided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, even in those days, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was always frustrate. Upon the Town of Cumæ they of Cumæ had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Comans, desiring them (as being also Comans) to be present at a solemn Sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient Guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Comans made shew to entertain; but privily sent word of all to S. Sempronius Gracchus, the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good Man of War; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have been Posthumus Al- binnus, that was lately slain by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the Election of Marcellus; or at least they feigned so to have done: because this was the first time that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Comans: not able to meet the Enemy in Field; yet intensive to all occasions that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his Men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skilful in the Exercises of War, than to keep it from quarrels, that might arise by upbraiding one another with their base condition.

Whilst the Consul was thus busied at Linternum, the Senators of Cumæ sent him word, of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his Men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had had experience. Gracchus therefore put himself into Cumæ; whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that City were expected by the Capuans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hæmæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Africanus the chief Magistrate of Capna, with fourteen thousand Men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather desiring how to surprise others, than fearing himself to be assailed. The Consul, therefore, suffering none to go forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Town when it grew dark: his Men being well refreshed with meat and sleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; losing not above an hundred of his own Men. Their Camp he took; but carried not long to rise it, for fear of Hannibal; who lay not far off. By this providence, he escaped a greater loss than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hæmæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to find those young Souldiers, and Slaves, busied in making spoil, and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill success, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent about this Town. They raised a wooden Tower against it: which they brought close unto the Walls; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inside of the Wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and found means at length, to consume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire, the Romans, falling out of the Town at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drove them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Conful wisely founded the Retreat; ere his Men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readiness to require their service. Neither would he, in the pride of this good success, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him barred the day following, near unto the Walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the Siege; and returned to his old Camp at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Conful had taken the Field, some small Towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yielded; and withal to abide (as it must do) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it self, was driven in the mean time to alter his course of War: and, instead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invasion upon the whole Country, to pass from place to place; and wait upon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the Enemy than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Sannites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Conful; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola; and received there the loss before-mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people showed not the like spirit in defending their Lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the victory. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to have Dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old the more easie means, to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intemperate, as necessity constrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship; and joyed with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason, commended, That being himself Conful, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formality, or regard what Men might think of his ambition, but caused himself to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Confuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, served to put the Carthaginians in fear, that Capua it self should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreaty came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum), and, having with his presence, comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-Town of Campania; about which he spent three days in vain, hoping to have won it. The Garrison in Puteoli was six thousand strong: and did their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good success, could only show his anger upon the Fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill success as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilst he was in his progress thither, Hanno made a journey against Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the last years Conful, halting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a Battel. Han- no had with him about seventeen thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelve hundred Horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moor. He held the Roman work four hours, ere it could be perceived, to which side the Victory would incline. But Gracchus his Soldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed Slaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, That this day, or never, they must purchase their liberty, bring every man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it; howbeit that vain labour, imposed by their General, of cutting off the slain Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly, and hindered the service, by employment of so many hands, in a work to little concerning the Victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own Error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the Battel, if they won the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrowen, if the Roman Horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Roman Battel, that four thousand of the Slaves, (for fear either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the Battel, unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength: yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Grofs of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loss. Leaving the Field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his Soldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoiled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the Wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unless sickness forced them to break his Order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Soldiers were feasted in publick by the Townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custom of Slaves manumitted) with Caps, or white Wool. The Picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first Battel, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the Victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hanno, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canne. But all this while, and longer after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help out. The Fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplussage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few they were in Italy, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could work to do than before; as living upon the same Trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it self. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yield yield great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the Detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Country, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased: so as if Money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be far less than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatness of the War within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cock to find him work at home; the greater threats of Adribach, to follow his brother over the Alpes; as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not Money for any one of these mortal dangers, were driven almost even to extremum want of counsel. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the Letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fabius, the Pretor, laid open the publick wants, and plainly said, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of Money for Vidual, Weapons, Apparel, or the like things needful to the Soldiers: but that such as had stuff, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities, and labours, until the War were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus, the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redress of disorders within the City, were chiefly intemperate to the correction of those that had misbehaved themselves in this present War. They began with L. Cæcilius Metellus: who, after the Battel at Canne, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the Message of their fellows made Prisoners at Canne, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by Oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whoever had not served in the Wars, after the term which the Laws appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtful only in Reputation: but greater weight was added thereto by this Decree of the Senate following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve until the end of the War, under the same hard Conditions that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Canne. The Office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose unhoneft or unequally behaviour fell not within compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publick Horfes of service, unro such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the over-sight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much revered and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could do) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick works; as mending of High-Ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other Buildings. If any man encroached upon the streets, high-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publick Revenues, to farm; so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholden unto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereof belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the Dignity of the Senate: the Commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were always of that Order, and careful to uphold the Reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impoverished by War, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Customs that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed, in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel, without expectation of any payment, before the end of the War. In like sort, the Masters of those Slaves, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, until the City were in better case to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the Goods of Orphans, and of Widows living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Quæstor kept a book, of all that was laid out for the sustentance of these Widows and Orphans: whilst the whole flock was used by the City. This good Example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Soldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yielded half so much Commodities, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, wherein to their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather enable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto the attained, ere the youngest of those Men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman Mortal grew more hard and solid; and by paring the Branches of private Fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Commonwealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State whose dimension or form is small, may apply serve to be a foundation of a great Monarchy: which chiefly comes to pass, where all regard of domestic prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great Example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength, grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it self to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as by extreme industry, and training themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient Resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, above all other, the great love of the Commonwealth, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, should in all reason have been more dear unto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those Wars which their latter Emperors made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great Vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those ways, by which Kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIV.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The Siege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the Gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the War: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Cephise Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the Enterprize was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the Siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus, seizing upon a Gate, entered with his Army, and put all to the Sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made Prisoners. If Fabius deserved commendations, by holding his word good unto these Fifty, I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heat of Execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself, after the Roman fashion, with some Equivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marston, in Galesburg, taken by the Marshal Montcalm, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parley about composition, the besieged ran all from their several Guards, upon half duty desire of being acquainted with the Conditions proposed. The Marshal therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entered by Scalade, and put all save the Governor unto the Sword. Herein that Governor of Mount Marston committed two gross Errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parley, without pledges for assurance given and received. Some such oversight the Governor of Cassine seemeth to have committed: yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Montcalm, was very honourable. When this work was ended, many small Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slain, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from those, that had promised to give up the Town. But M. Valerius, the Roman Proprætor, had thrust so many Men into it, that the Traitors durst not stir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himself in vain with expectation. Yet he waited not the Country; but contented himself with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and began to victual it, when Summer was but half past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town: in which regard if he began his Winter more timely, than otherwise need required, he did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to travel up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily; whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speak hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius, the Son of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needful for the publick service, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the War, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: Eleven of the Twelve Lictors, which carried each an Axe, with a bundle of Rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reverence, to pass by them on horse-back; which was against the custom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his Feet. The Father cheerfully did so, saying, It was my mind, Son, to make trial, whether thou didst understand thy self to be Consul. Cassius Albinus, a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the Battel at Cannæ, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, feeling now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old Examples: and to make this Albinus a pattern to all Traitors; using him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their unfaithful service against the Falsci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius, the Father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as Prisoner, until they could better resolve what to do with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal, understanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize upon all the Mans Riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seem rather severe, than covetous, he sent for the Wife and Children of Albinus into his Camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intention of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himself. Fabius, the Consul, shortly after came to Arpi: which he wan by Scalade, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibal's Soldiers lay in the Town; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust forth by the Carthaginian Garrison, when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Soldiers held the Townsmen suspected;

and therefore thought it no wisdom, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians; against their wills. In process of this discourse, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for security of the Town, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibal's men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their Companions, and serve on the Roman side, it was yet covenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to pass forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman again, with little other loss, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tudertanus, one of the Prætors: and unto Cneius Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred and twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service, upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the general hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Conventines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their Example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican, had made himself a Captain, and gotten Reputation by some petty Exploits in foraging the Countrey, was slain by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing over that help out of Macedonia, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to pass; and being loth to hazard his Forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence, he contented himself, with taking in some poor Towns of the Salentinians. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their Conspiracy, who lay at Rome, as Ambassador, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his Company were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their business the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent again to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their Plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chief among them, used much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they missed of their Game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seem to have been abroad upon other occasions. From the Camp of Hannibal, it was about three days journey to Tarentum, if he should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place the less to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, he caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careless of such his Neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their business in order, he took with him ten thousand the most expedite of his Horse and Foot, and long before break of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourcore light Horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the ways, and killing any that they met, for fear left he, and his Troop following him, should be discovered. It had been often the manner of some few Numidian Horse, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the Evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the Fields, took it for a sign, that Hannibal was not as yet disclosed; and gave order, that some Companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their Booty, and send them gone. But when it grew dark night, Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the Town: where, according to the Tokens agreed upon, making a light to show his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, answered him with another light, in sign that he was ready. Presently Nico began to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the Watchmen. Philomenes went toward another Gate: and whilstling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Boar, so heavy, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the Wicket: and forthwith entered two young men, laden with the Boar; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largeness of the Beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Boar-Spear: and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the Watch; whom when he had slain, he opened the great Gate. So the Army of Hannibal, entering Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Marketplace; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their General, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their Guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheer. All the Town was in an uproar; but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman Trumpet was unskillfully sounded by a Greek in the Theatre; which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and shewed what else he thought fit for the present. This done: and having gotten such spoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addressed himself against the Citadel: hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation, it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravely falling forth, gave charge upon his Men: who fell back of purpose, according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and so far from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a sign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drove him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could run; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadel stood upon a Demi-Island, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall against the Town, whereunto it was joined by a Cawley. This Cawley Hannibal intended to fortify in like sort against the Citadel; to the end, that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His work in few days went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Piece itself, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of Engines, to force the place. But whilst he was busied in his Works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counsel. Now so far as the Tarentine Fleet lay within the Haven, and could not pass forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadel: it seemed likely, that the Town would suffer want, being debarred of accomod Trade and Provisions by Sea; whilst the Roman Garrison, by help of their Shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their Fleet could get out of the Haven, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town standing in plain ground, and their streets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over Land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he undertook and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced to great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwise busied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loss on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman Forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hasty growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, whereinto the loss at Cannae had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were fain to take up young Boys, that were under seventeen years of age: and to send Commissioners above fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appear serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of service whereunto they were bound by order of the City, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning to young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campanians felt great want of Victuals, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloath of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoil, which the Romans had in forcing going years made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. He gave them comfortable words; and sent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all manner of Carriages, to store themselves with Victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of Grain, that had been layed up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than forty Carts or Waggons, with a few Pack-horses; as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the wretchedness of the Campanians. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them, they were worse than very Beasts, since hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day, against which he made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius, the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needful for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made enquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno, with part of his Army, was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Waggons, with a great rabble of Carters, and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their Camp; so that their good order was kept; all thought being for upon a great Harvest. Hereupon the Consul had his Men prepare themselves, to assault the Enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward to early in the morning, that he was there with the first break of day. By coming so unexpected, he had well-near forced the Camp on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the Fight continued, the less desire had the Romans to lose more of his Men in the Attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to go more leisurely and substantially to work; to send for his fellow-Consul, with the rest of their Army, and to lie between Hanno and home; that neither the Campanians should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieve them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the Retreat, he saw, that some of his Men had gotten over the Enemies Rampart. There was great booty; or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore some English-bearers threw their Ensigns over the Rampart, willing their Men to fetch them out, unless they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a loss. Fear of such ignominy, than which none could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately, that Fabius, perceiving the heat of his Men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the Example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were slain above six thousand; and taken, above seven thousand; besides all the store of Victuals, and Carriages, with abundance of Booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pitiful Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to profess unto their City; and how he had made them, to affect it no less than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words; and sent away two thousand Horse, to keep their grounds from spoil; whilst he himself was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Towns adjoining, to yield unto him. Among the Holdings of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being over-taken, suffered Death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the Death of their Holdings; and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their Gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reason; had not some Companies lain in their Town; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Nevertheless they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their Gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand; against whom whilst they professed their service to Asinius, the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight; and recoiling from him, closed up their Gates. A little formality they used, in pretending fear, lest the Enemy should break in together with the Romans; in saving Asinius himself, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chief Men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yield to the Carthaginian, or no. But this Disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good success, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilst the Consuls, fortifying Beneventum, to secure their backs, addressed themselves unto the Siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great Enterprize. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Consul, was slain either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into an Ambush; or by some Carthaginian straglers, among whom he fell unawares. His Body, or his Head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his Death happened in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that business. The Volturnes, or Slaves lately manumitted, forsook their Ensigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader: so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless the Consuls went forward with their work: and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago, the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gave them an hard welcome; wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, fuls, and had the better; inasmuch, that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went several ways: Fulvius toward Cume; Claudius unto Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compass about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Centenius Penula, a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurio, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the Virtue of any good Soldier; how mean soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and he himself, being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up to him Voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a stout Centurio, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) slain, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, with eighteen thousand Men, was in Apulia, very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore hastened, to visit him: hoping to deal the better with the main strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those Forces, that lay in the Provinces about under Men of small ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his Men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Sages, with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battel to Fulvius, he soon had him in the Trap: whence he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers dead behind him.

These two great blows, received one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Nevertheless all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should go substantially forwards with the Siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls fate down before the Town: and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue forth of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their own strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian: which round him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which Expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, upon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as brave re-comforted. He bad them consider, how a few days since he had chased the Consuls, out of their Fields; and told them, that we would presently come thither again, and fend the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned: and hardly could get back into the City, which for Hannibal himself, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendship, would hold out a long time: and thereby give him leisure, to do what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Eastern parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it self in a tedious Siege. Thus he lingered: and thereby gave the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the Election of new Magistrates in Rome, whilst he himself pursued hopes, that never found success.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their term of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the Siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The Townsmen often failed out: rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan Horse (for their Foot was easily beaten) the Romans used to thrust out some Troops, that should hold them skirmish. In these Exercises the Campan usually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who seemed to take foil at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore desired, that some active and courageous young men, should learn to ride behind the Roman Men at Arms; leaping up, and again dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Vestels, having each of them three or four small Darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies Horse; whom vanquishing in this kind of service, they much disheartened in the main. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length; not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unserviceable people on the Walls; which, with a loud noise of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himself to the Campan, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he drove them at length back into their City. Nevertheless, in pursuing them to their Gates, he received a Wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his Grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his task, by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirty, were either gotten within the Rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slain upon it, fell into the Ditch; and filled it up in such sort, that their bodies served as a bridge unto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this Tumult caused some Fugitives, that could speak Latin well, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consul's name, That every one of the Soldiers should shift for himself, and fly betimes unto the next Hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. All would not serve. The fraud was detected: and the Army, having seen there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it self;

so as little hope there was to raise the Siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it self: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadel, nor City of Tarentum, were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himself and his hard fortune, that of so many great Victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, even to set upon Rome; and carry to the Walls of that proud City, the danger of War that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals; or one of them at least, unto the defence of their own home. If they rose from the Siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their Forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Campan, should well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he despair that the terror of his coming might so astonish the Multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only fear was, lest the Campan, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent Letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a Fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himself thence over the innermost Trenches into the City. The journey to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good success, resting in the suddenness of his arrival there. Wherefore he caused his Men, to have in a readiness ten days Victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Army over the River of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some Fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate: which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsel to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the Enemy. Others were so far from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himself strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out, and fend him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the Forces that at the present were in Rome: who since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needful to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoveful: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their Siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, the choice of his whole Army: with which he hastened toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reason of his wound, to continue the Siege at Capua.

Hannibal, having passed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats; and left nothing that might serve to transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hastened he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down, by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way: so it made him the more grievously to spoil their Lands, whilst the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Messengers of these news came apace, one after another, into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pelted with Women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their Hair, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with Soldiers; it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this Trepidation, there came news, that Q. Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastening to defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his return home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equal power with the Consuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so took they more careful and especial order, against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Town: whence he advanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along a great way under the Walls; viewing the fire thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many Tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to pass through the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Colina, where it was thought that their service might be useful, among broken ways, and Garden-walls lying in the Suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out, that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the Walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of Carrel, and Husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up; and the poor Nu-midians pitifully beaten from the boult-tops, with stones and other Weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate Multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordain'd, That all which had been Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have Authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following, Hannibal pass'd over Enien, and presented Battell to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertook it. It is said, that a terrible shower of Rain, caus'd both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their several Camps: and that this happened two days together, the weather breaking up, and clearing, as soon as they were departed alunder. Certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten days provision, could not endure to stay there, until his Victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffer'd him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well-advised men: if they offer'd to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibal's coming to the City, how great soever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of his Forces, which appear'd less than the first apprehension had form'd them, was much and soon abated. Hereunto it help'd well, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spain, after the Death of the two Scipios, was sent out of the Town, and went forth at one Gate, whilst the Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panic terrors, as they are call'd, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatness of the sudden conflagration; it is a good remedy, to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men have fashion'd it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his Soldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him, that could tell who had sent the As into the Camp. But in this present Example of the Romans, appears wial a great magnanimity: whereby they sustai'd their reputation, and augmented it no less, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their Enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their Valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteem'd him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamp'd, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity coming to his ear, incens'd Hannibal so much, that he made Port-felle of the Silver-smiths Shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own Title to the Houses within the Town, were no whit worse than any Roman Citizen could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he rais'd his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceiv'd; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His Victuals were almost spent: and of those ends that he had propos'd unto himself, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil he could in the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein Wealth was to be gotten, he pass'd like a Tempest over the Countrey; and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City of Rhegium before his arrival was fear'd or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have cur'd the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City, since he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation a-new, that who-so would yield, before a certain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman Pardon proclaim'd, every mans conscience of his own evil deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given by Hanno and Bostar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again, if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken, by some Nu-midians: who running, as Fugitives, out of the Town, into the Roman Camp, wait'd fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their Packets. But it hapn'd, ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detect'd by an Harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno, were taken and open'd, concerning a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoever they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those Victories at Trubia, Therapene, and Cornae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their Enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate Sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow. But Hannibal had already done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein (as afterward he protest'd) he was vanquish'd by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieg'd in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannoniens, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shew'd) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands hands of all such counterfeiter Fugitives, as carried such Messengers, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle break the hearts of the Campani: so that the Multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, caus'd them to assemble, and consult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators, and such as a few years since had been most forward in joining with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheer, he would drink to them such an Health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemy fought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking Poyson. All the rest, hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yielded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open: whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entering, disarm'd the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and command'd all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid Irons upon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of Gold and Silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody: some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general Multitude; they were refer'd unto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly us'd by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of Death, by the Wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campani; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his Daughter in Marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more haughty in taking vengeance: for fear, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought becomful to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the pains, to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caus'd all the Campan Prisoners to suffer Death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he smuck off their heads.

This terrible Example of Vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Campani; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Astellans, Calatines, and Sabatinens, people of the Campani, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear, and want of ability to resist. They were therefore us'd with the like rigor, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire to many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argu'd that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaim'd unto any Slave, and other sufficient reward unto any Freeman, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campani, being detect'd by a Slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred Marks) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incens'd against this wretched people, held them in a manner as Prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caus'd them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolv'd in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffer'd before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an Harlot) were found not guilty of the late Rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their Wives and Children, sold for Slaves; and their Goods confiscat'd; others laid in Prison, and refer'd to further deliberation: but the generality of them, command'd to depart out of Campania by a certain day; and confin'd unto several places, as best lik'd the angry Victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was suffer'd to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious fire: but no Corporation, or form of polity, was allowed to be therein: only a Roman Provost was every year sent, to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important; hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his Oil being far spent; and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. X V.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia, and Sicil, held War against the Romans in those Islands; and were overcome.

W Hilst things pass'd thus in Italy, the Com-motions rais'd in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian Rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in Arms, ere the Roman Forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harfecor, with his Son Hufwe, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno, a Carthaginian, that promis'd the assistance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this Enterprize so careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better, if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would have suffic'd, if they could have hindr'd the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harfecor, with his followers, might well enough have serv'd to drive out Q. Mutius, the Prætor; who lay sick in the Province; and not more weak in his own Body, than in his Train. But whilst they sought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous: they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this Enterprize was such, as may seem to have discourag'd them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Afdrubal, furnam'd the bold, with a competent Fleet and Army; assist'd in this Expedition by Hanno, the Author of the Rebellion, and by

Margo,

Merge, a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and near Kinfaun to Hannibal: it fo fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was caft upon the Baleares; fo beaten, and in fuch evil plight, that the Sardinians had even fpent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquifhed, ere thefe their friends could arrive to fuccour them.

Titus Manlius was fent from Rome with two and twenty thoufand Foot, and twelve hundred Horfe, to fettle the eftate of that Ifland, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Confulfhip. It was a laudable cuftom of the Romans, to prefeve and uphold in their feveral Provinces, the greatnefs and reputation of thofe men, and their families, by whom each Province had been firft fubdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatfoever accident required the affiftance of a Patron: the firft Conqueror, and his Race after him, were the moft ready and beft approved means, to procure the benefit of the people fubdued. Herby the Romans held very free intelligence in every Province, and had always in readinefs fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any fuch diforder, as would otherwife have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harfcoras fo ftrong in Field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thoufand, whereof we have fpeakn before: He landed at Calaris, or Carallus: where mooring his Ships, he paffed up into the Countrey, and fought out the Enemy. Hyofius, the Son of Harfcoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his Father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their fide. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battel to the Romans at his own difcretion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Soldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and left in one day about thirty thoufand of his followers. Hyofius himfelf, with the reft of his broken Troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Ifland: whither Manlius purfued them. Very foon after this defeat came Afdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to win all Sardinia, in fuch halfe as he might have done, if the Tempeft had not hindered his Voyage; yet foon enough, and ftrong enough to live the Town of Cornus, and to put a new fpirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himfelf back to Calaris: where he had not fayed long, ere the Sardinians (fuch of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his affiftance; their Countrey being wafted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refufed to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had fayed a little longer, Afdrubal would have fought him out with fome blemifh to his Reputation. But the fame of Afdrubal and his Company, appears to have been greater than were their ftrengh. For after fome trill made of them in a few skirmifhes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battel: wherein he flew twelve thoufand of the Enemies; and rook of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thoufand. Four hours the Battel lafted: and Victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iflanders; whole courages had been broken in their unprosperous fight not many days before. The Death of young Hyofius, and of his Father Harfcoras, that flew himfelf for grief, together with the Captivity of Afdrubal himfelf, with Mago and Hanno, the Carthaginians; made the Victory the more famous. The vanquifhed Army fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in fhort fpace won the Town. All other Cities of the Ifle that had rebelled, followed the Example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Romans: who impofing upon them fuch increafe of tribute, or other punifhment, as beft forted with the nature of their feveral offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The War in Siell was of greater length, and every way more burdenfome to Rome: as alfo the Victory brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fafers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and Dominion of Syracufe, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the Battel of Canne, the old King of Syracufe died: who had continued long a ftidfaft friend unto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this prefent War. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus, his Grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo, his Son, that fhould have been his Heir, being dead before. To this young King his Succellor, Hiero appointed Fifteen Tutors; of which the principal were Andromodorus, Zoilus, and Themifius; who had married his Daughters, or the Daughters of Gelo. The reft were fuch, as he judged moft likely to prefeve the Kingdom, by the fame art, whereby himfelf had gotten, and fo long kept it. But within a little while, Andromodorus, waxing weary of fo many Coadjutors, began to commend the fufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and faid, that he was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he caufed others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to pafs in a fort as he defired. For Hieronymus, laying afide all care of government, gave himfelf wholly over to his pleafures: or if he had any regard of his Royal Dignity, it was only in matter of exterior fhew, as wearing a Diadem with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed Guard. Herby he offended the Eyes of his People, that had never feen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo, his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, fuitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that, in courfe of life, he would revive the Memory of Tyrans dead long fince, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, luftful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him: fo that fuch of his late Tutors as could efcape him by flight, were glad to live in banifhment: the reft, being moft of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his difpleafure, that feemed worfe than Death it felf. Only Andromodorus, Zoilus, and one Thrafio, continued in grace with him, and were his Counfellors, but not of his Cabinet. Thefe, howfoever they agreed in other points, were at fome diftention about that main point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleafures, which was fet on change: but Thrafio, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earearnelt to continue the amity with Rome. Whilt as yet it remained fomewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline; a Conpiracy againft his Perfon, was detected by a Groom of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would fpeak any thing: but yielding (as it feemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture; he confeffed, that he had been fet on by Thrafio; whom he appeached of the Treafon, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All thefe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conpirators, walked boldly in the ftreets, and never fhunk for the matter: affuring themfelves, that the reftitution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all efaped, and foon after found means to execute their purpofe. The King himfelf, when Thrafio was taken out of the way, quickly refolved upon fiding with the Carthaginians; where-to he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firft they grow Mafters of themfelves, love to feem wifer than their Fathers, by taking different courfes. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceffity, had of late been fuch, as might have been termed exceffive, were it not in regard of his Providence; wherein he took order for his own eftate, that depended upon them. But the young Nephew, taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things prefent; and the weaknefs of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much Money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to fhoulder up a falling houfe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entered into good correfpondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians born, but grandchildren of a banifhed Syracufian. Thefe grew into fuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Appius Claudius, the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the People of Rome and the King of Syracufe; his Meffengers were difmiffed with an open fcoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him, the order of the Fight at Canne: that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himfelf: faying, That he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; fo wonderful was the Victory as they reported it. Having thus difmiffed the Romans, he fent Embaffadors to Carthage, where he concluded a League: with condition, that a great part of the Ifland fhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he fhould reign over all Siell; and the Carthaginians reft fatisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At thefe doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly ftir: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that he behoved not the Romans, to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by neceffity; and partly (as may feem) for that the reputation, both of himfelf, and of his City, had received fuch blemifh, by that which happened unto him in his journey, as much difcountenanced him when he came into Siell, and forbad him to look big. The Money that Hiero had beftowed upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their neceffity, this Appius was to carry back unto him: it being refufed by the Roman Senate, with greater bravery than their prefent fortune would allow. But inftead of returning the Money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noifed abroad that he fhould do: the War againft Philip, King of Macedon (whereof we have fpeakn before) compelled the Romans to lay afide their vain glory, and fend word after him, that he fhould confider that Money over to Marcus Valerius; of whose Voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwife wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family, is taxed with pride) his Errand was changed, from a glorious attestation of the Roman Magnanimity; into fuch a pitiful tune of thanksgiving, as muft needs have bred sorrow and commiseration, in fo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of paffime and fcorn, in Hieronymus, the new King.

But whilt Hieronymus was more defirous of War, than well relolved how to begin it: his own Death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the ftate of Syracufe; which thereby might have profpered more than ever, had it been wifely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we fpeak before, were fent about the Countrey with two thoufand men, to follicit the Towns, and perfwade them to fhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himfelf, with an Army of fifteen thoufand Horfe and Foot, went to Leontium, a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Ifland fall to him in all halfe, and accept him for Sovereign. There the Conpirators took him on the fudden, as he was paffing through a narrow ftreet; and rufting between him and his Guard, ftruck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the Guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Mafters Death. Yet for fear of the worft, a great largels was promifed unto the Soldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought fo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, fuffered his Carcals to lie unburied. Thefe news ran quickly to Syracufe: whither fome of the Conpirators, taking the Kings Horfe, pofted away, to fignifie all that had paffed; to ftir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andromodorus, if he, or his fellows, would make offer to ufurp a Tyranny. The Syracufians hereupon prefently took Arms, and made themfelves Mafters of their own City. Andromodorus on the other fide fortified the Palace, and the Ifland; being yet uncertain what to do; between defire of making himfelf a Sovereign Lord, and fear of fuffering punifhment, as a Tyrant, if his Enterprife mifcarried. His Wife Demarata, that was the Daughter of Hiero, cherifhed him in his hopes: putting him in mind of that well known proverb, which Dionyfius had ufed: That a Tyrant fhould keep his place, till he were hated out of it by the people, and not ride away from it on Horfe-back. But fears, and better counfel prevailed fo far, that Andromodorus, having fleep upon the matter, difarmed his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunities. The next day he came forth, and made a fpeech unto the People: telling them, That he was glad to fee, how prudently they behaved themfelves in fo great a change; that he had flood in fear, left they would not have contained themfelves within bounds of difcretion; but rather have fought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberty perforce, but to wad it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and rendered up the charge, committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to govern the City; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But such was his desire of Sovereignty; and so vehement were the indignations of his Wife; that shortly he began to practice with Hippocrates, Epicles, and other Captains of the Mercenaries: hoping to make himself strong, by their help: that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicles, had been with the Syracusan Prætors, and told them, that, being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captain, had done him, whilst he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to return home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed: and with a Convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Lori. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusan Magistrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesy; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good Soldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made them: they were more mindful of the business, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult: especially of the Roman Fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusans were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his own, and of his Wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed it to all the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slain out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the evil which they had done, whilst Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the Tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the Daughters of Hiero and Gelo, were accessory to this dangerous Treason: and that the unquiet Spirits of these Women, would never cease to work, until they had recovered those Royal Ornaments, and Sovereign Power, whereof their Family was now dispossessed. These Daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo, were also condemned to die: and Executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heraclea, the Daughter of Hiero, and Wife of Scippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two young Daughters, in the hasty Execution of this rash judgment. Her Husband, Scippus, was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Ambassador to King Pharao, &c. he durst not return home, but stayed in Ægypt, as a banished man.

This consideration, when it was too late, together with some other pitiful accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardoning themselves) all cried out upon the authors of so foul a Butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate, and knowing no otherwise how to satisfy their anger; they called for an Election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slain: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the Election were present a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of Soldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicles, Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the less that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Prætors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusans and the Romans. But having striven in vain, and seeing that the People stood in fear of Sp. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old League of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practice. The Leontines had some need of a Garrison: and to them was sent Hippocrates, the Prætor; attended by such Fugitives, and mercenary Soldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of Hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, first word unto the Syracusans, that they had already broken the League: and that the Peace would never be kept sincerely, until this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicles, fearing to sustain the blame of his Brother's proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the War, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himself unto the Leontines, whom he persuaded to rebel against the Syracusans. For he said, that since they had all of late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death as well as the Syracusans; yea, or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedom purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should bear Dominion over those that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogance should be checked sometimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one Article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracusans. For it was agreed, That all which had been subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this Article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicles told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their Fathers had lost not many Ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been subdued by the same hand, which took liberty from the Syracusans. But seeing they had long since yielded unto Syracuse, and been subject unto that that City, by what form soever it was governed; this claim of liberty was rather feasible than just. Nevertheless the motion of Epicles was highly approved: insomuch that when Messengers came soon after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Lori, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusans, to make any bargains with them, either to Lori, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer, was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusans: who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines, their Rebels; with condition that when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forthwith took the business in hand; which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all, save the Castle, whereto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night, conveyed themselves into the Town of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after Victory; to seek out the fugitive Roman Slaves and Renegades, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Soldiers, he took to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoil them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slain Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Town to sack. These news met the Syracusan Army upon the way, as it was going to join with Marcellus, who had ended his business before. About Eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had been sent forth of Syracuse, under Sofis and Dimonnes, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines, and other Rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Soldiers that followed them, had those Diseases, with which all Mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-Soldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had been so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turn their unequiet thoughts another way, and set them a-work in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So toward Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicles, the architects of all this mischief, devising what further harm they might do, but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no less well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little less desperate than their present case. They infused forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Olive-branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the Vanguard, that had been well used by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal; who had taken them Prisoners in the Italian War, and lovingly dismissed them. These Creteans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bad them be of good cheer; saying, that no man should do them harm, as long as they could use their Weapons. Herewithal the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident ran swiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by Severity; which would not serve. For when they commanded these two Traitors to be laid in Irons; the Exclamation was so violent against them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what course to take, unto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a trick, whereby to help himself, and better the uncertain case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Creteans; directed (as they made them) from the Syracusan Prætors, to Marcellus. The Contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the Sword among the Leontines: but that he farther behaved him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed; the uproar was such, that Sofis and his fellow-Prætor, were glad to forsake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracusans remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Soldiers, if the two Artificers of the Sedition had not saved their lives, rather to keep them as Plagues, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They persuaded also a mischievous Knave that had served among the Leontines, to justify the bruit of Marcellus his cruelty; and to carry home the news to Syracuse, as an Eye-witness. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with causeless indignation. In good time (said some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilst they were thus discoursing, and devising how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates, with his Army, came to the Gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unless for want of help, they would be betrayed to their Enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the Soldiers to force a Gate, was no whit greater than the headstrong fury of those within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entered, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the Sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers until night. The next day he went openly to work; and after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty to all Slaves and Prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himself and his brother Prætors, in Tide, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as Enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and an half of the Town, sent before him, some to require a parley. These were entertained without the Walls, by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracuzans, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Town, might be suffered to return and enjoy their own; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their Errand had been to him, he could have told what to say to them: but since it was directed unto others, they should do well to return, when those to whom they were sent, had the Government in their hands. As for the War which they threatened, he told them, they should find by experience, that to besiege Syracuse, was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he sent them gone, and returned back into the City. Immediately began the Siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easy winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of Walls, as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kind of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning, but did his best both by Land and Sea. Nevertheless all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill success of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the virtue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despair of hasty Victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes, the noble Mathematician; who at the request of Hiero, the late King, that was his Kinsman, had framed such Engines of War, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Cannon, or any instruments of Gun-powder, had they in that Age been known. This Archimedes discouraging once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole Earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other Earth, or place of fire footing, whereon a man might stand. For proof of this bold assertion, he performed some strange works; which made the King intreat him to convert his study unto things of use, that might preserve the City from danger of Enemies. To such Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the Liberal Sciences, to submit learned Propositions unto the workmanship, and gain of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Author; who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed unto him to profane their Science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly task a man for wile as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were published: and being once made known, to be undervalued, as falling within compass of the meanest wit, and things, that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable Example of Columbus his discovery, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely Example, we may see most apparent proof. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade, will think it ridiculous to hear one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in Natural Philosophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the less, for that the labour of workmanship grows to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being devised, and bettered, by great Scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could flubber things easily over, and feed their Workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchemists, and all others, that have, or would seem to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kind of injustice, that the long Travels of an understanding Brain, beside the loss of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth, or yield less benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his Enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envy, have in it any thing allowable and natural, as have Anger, Fear, and other the like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those which would usurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Nevertheless if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generality of Mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sun to shine upon the just and unjust: it will appear more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the World, those good things that lie buried in their own bosoms. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Artem, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: better it were that such a Jewel remain close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, bind all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to do mischief. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracuzans to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his own direction, that after his death more of the same kind were not made, nor those of his own making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved, even unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especial benefit unto his Country. For to enrich a Mechanical Trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certain of his Quinquere Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the Wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundry devices; of which any one sort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He took heavy stones and long pieces of Timber, like unto the Yards of Ships; which brake force of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay far off. They that were come nearer the Walls, lay open to a continual Volley of Shot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the Prow, and hoisted up; shaking out all the water; and afterward falling down into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the air; where turning round a while, they were broken against the Walls, or cast upon the Rocks; and all of them were so beaten, that they durst never come to any second assault. In like sort was the Land-Army handled: Stones and Timber, falling upon it like Hail; did not only overwhelm the Men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day, get near unto the Walls; they should be (as it were) under the point blank, and receive no hurt by their terrible Instruments; which were wound up hard, to shoot a great compass. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives. For the shot came down right upon them: and beating them from all parts of the Wall, made a great slaughter of all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to stay by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of Timber, or a Ropes end, upon the Walls, they ran away, crying out, that Archimedes his Engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his Men, that fear; against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had stood upon the Wall, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight; being erected in the streets behind the Walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of Victuals, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate piece of work. For the Enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them; were not likely to soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be starved out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsel to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himileo, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage; and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make War upon the Romans in Sicily by Land. He took many Towns; and many, that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians, did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus, with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Pelorus and Herbessus, which yielded unto him. He took also Megara by force, and sacked it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracuzans; or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His especial desire was to have saved Agrippinus; whether he came too late; for Himileo had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian, that was too strong for him. The circumstance that he used, in regard of Himileo, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his Brother, had lately lifted out of the City, with ten thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; intending to join his Forces with Himileo. Marcellus tell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easy Victory, against the dispersed, and half unarmed Syracuzans. The Reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from Rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo, joining with Hippocrates, ran over all the Island at his pleasure; and presented Battle to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Romans wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great Fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and virtual Fleet into the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed to again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Romans; and flew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the Siege, went unto Leontium; where he lay intensive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring, he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse; or to turn all his Forces to besieging Agrippinus, against Himileo and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his Reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to prevail: and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an Enterprize, that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before, and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfil his desire. Especially he stayed to prevail by Treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easy for them to do; because the Town would hearken to no parley. At length a Slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to run away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: where the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a Fish-boat that passed forth in the night. But when they were grown to the number of Fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance: all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the mean while, one Damaspippus, a Lacedaemonian, that had been sent out of the Town, as an Ambassador to Philip, King of Macedonia, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicles was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not far from the Walls. There one of the Romans looking upon the Wall, and wanting the more commendable art of Geometry, fell to numbering the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it less than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that Ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great Fleet was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three days: and that, because other good cheer was not so plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicles, to gratify the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunity could not be withheld. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the festival night, came unto the Walls, which he took by Scala. Syracuse was divided into four parts (or five, if Epicles were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some pieces, he had the commodity of a better and safe lodging, with good store of booty; and the better opportunity than before, to deal with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina, and the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition; as being much terrified by the loss of those parts, which the Romans had taken and carried. As for the Weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto those that were sheltered under strong houses: although it may seem, that the inner Walls were not altogether unfortified of his help; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman Fugitives, and Renegades, were more careful than ever to defend the rest of the City; being sure to be rewarded with a cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradina, upon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the assailants were repelled. Nevertheless, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as freightly besieged, as he himself did besiege the Town. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat less) afflicted with the same pestilence, inasmuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great Forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to do his Country service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong Fleet: where he stayed; being loth to double the Cape; for that the Winds did better serve the Enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman Fleet, that was ready for him, he stood off into the deep; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicles return into Syracuse, but went to Agirgentum: where he expected himself, with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers, that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could safely, unto Marcellus; and some of them in a strong Town three Miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicily was given as desolate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of Peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town: Hercuto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had stayed there long enough; and had cause to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong again. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers, that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws, and belonging unto the Kings. Herupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death; new Prætors chosen; and the Gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman Fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their own condition to be desperate, persuaded the other Mercenary Souldiers, that the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently took Arms, and fell upon the new chosen Prætors; whom they slew; and made Election of six Captains that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all, to the Souldiers; excepting only the Fugitives. The Treaty therefore was again set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion; which yet was delayed, either by some fear of the Citizens, that had seen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epicles, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might use the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject unto Rome. Mericus, a Spaniard, was one of the six Captains, that had been chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing too and fro. This crafty Agent persuaded Mericus, that the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purposed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himself to the will of the Roman General. By such hopes the Spanish Captain was easily won: and sent forth his own Brother among the Syracusan Embassadors, to ratify the Covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusans, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hero to the Romans had been such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruin of his Country: much less, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poor poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time; and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the Death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many the principal of Epicles his followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascality, and some ill advised persons, joined with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans; by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a Treaty of peace held with the Syracusans, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home. But the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusans with gentle words, and promises of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many ways important. Nevertheless, if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs, wherewith Syracuse was obnoxious, both by evil Neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed: we may truly affirm, that it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only secured against all foreign Enemies, Domestical Conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested by the Disease of ambition; wherewith Marcellus his Dislike of ambition was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable; unless we should approve the answer of that Thief, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from a sick man, said, He never knewes drinking.

By the Treason of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could have been hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self; that maintained War by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvelously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched, save only the houses of those banished men, that had eloped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents, the Death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing Figures, that he hearkened not to the noise and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the Death of him; and caused his Body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an Inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An Invention of so little use; as this may seem, pleased that great Artificer better, than the devising of all those Engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is between the judgment of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the Money lost, that had been spent upon a Son, whose Studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicily yielded unto the Romans; except Agirgentum, and a few places thereabout. At Agirgentum lay Epicles, with one Hanno, a Carthaginian, and Mirmes, an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mirmes, by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withal made his own name great. By his persuasions, Hanno and Epicles adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town; and not to have themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsel, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicles and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mirmes, to be his Companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himself.

The indignity seemed the greater, when Mirmes, being to step aside unto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicles) not to meddle with the Enemy, until his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battle unto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth, and ability, in matter of War. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains; and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glorious Envy of Hanno carried him unto the Fight, upon a foolish desire to get Victory, without the help of Mirmes, their Countryman. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bad him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his Enemies that day; but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set upon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Agirgentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not have hazarded a battle without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus, was shortly after to leave the Province; and soon upon his departure, there landed in the Island a supply of Eight thousand Foot, and three thousand Numidian Horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Stilicians into Rebellion. The Roman Army, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannae, took it very heartily, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutinus had pacified his Countrymen the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hannibal; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been intire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacify his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Towns that had rebelled; although he could not hinder Mutinus from over-running all the Country; yet he hindered the Country from revolting unto Mutinus. Above three score Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which, Agiruntum was the principal; and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutinus as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans: not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hannibal, instead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envy, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instructions from old Hanno at Carthage; not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibals, to have share in the honour of these Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: he took away from Mutinus his charge, and gave it to his own Son; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spiteful dealing, occasioned the loss of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Countryman, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong, and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Levinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutinus enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; he thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his own game, and to forsake that City, which was likely to perish by the evil counsel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countrymen had lately done, content himself to see his Adversaries reap the bitter fruits of their own malicious over-weening: and to suffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conspired against them, to deliver up Agiruntum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advices. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutinus had undertaken. For he, with his Numidians, did forcibly seize upon a gate; whereas they let in some Roman Companies, that lay near in a readiness for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacify the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutinus, forthwith betook himself to flight: and saving himself, with Epistides, in a small Bark, set sail for Africa; leaving all his Army and adherents in Sicily, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued Masters of the whole Island.

Levinus, the Consul, having taken Agiruntum, did sharp execution of justice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for Slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the Money that was raised of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome stood in no less necessity of gold than of steel: which may have been the reason, why Levinus dealt so cruelly with the Agiruntines. Nevertheless, the fame of such severity, bred a terror among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and six only staid to be won by force. These things done, Levinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thousand men from Agiruntum; that were a Company of Our-laws, Bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoil of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their occupation against the Bruttians, a villainish kind of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutinus, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good account; accompanying the two Scipios in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very special service. So by this Enterprize of Sicily, the Carthaginians waited much of their Forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this War, the entire possession of this Island; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the War passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great Victory at Metaurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where, for his good services done in the Island of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the War, but was fain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He stayed not long in Rome, before he was again chosen Consul, together with M. Valerius Levinus, who succeeded him in the government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making War against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusanians, for that which he had done unto them: they alleging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater Enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned up the labours and dangers whereunto whereunto they had put him: willing them to be contented themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to allege, the Senate made such an end of the Controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Commonwealth: blaming the too much rigor of Marcellus; yet not restoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusanians free from their subjection; but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopeful promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Levinus, were appointed to make War, as their loss should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicily. The Ille of Sicily fell unto Marcellus, which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague, to the end that the Syracusanians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem himself to be afraid, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatched, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family; to the great benefit of his Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicily, whose doings there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Soldiers to the War; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services; especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there Money enough in the Treasury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who, in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustain all publick charges. Hereat the People murmured; and were ready to fall into sedition, had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the Multitude had already endured so much, as well it could undergo; and somewhat more than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintain the War against the Carthaginians, or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy, without a strong Fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion, That, since the common Treasury was so empty, the People must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, likeat was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the Money that he had; and that no Senator should keep any vessel of Gold, or Plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowl, wherewith to make their offerings unto the Gods: as also a Ring for himself, with such other tokens of ingenuity for his Wife and Children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publick necessity could no otherwise be holpen, every one was contented that his private Estate should run the same fortune with the Commonwealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his prosper subistence. This Magnanimity deserved well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet; Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; and Levinus toward Sicily. This Army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seem to remember him, and think upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the loss of Capua: which gave them cause to look unto themselves; as if in his help there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Towns that he suspected, and thereby to diminish his Army, that he should not be able to keep the Field: or else he must leave them to their own fidelity; which now began to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked; and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himself; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian Horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater loss than the Town it self. Blasius, the author of this Rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect, without getting the consent of one Dafnus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafnus in private; and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convicted, and charged of Treason, he stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault; that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meer Malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to press his adversary anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reasons, that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Prefently after this, the Consul took by force, Maronea and Miles; Towns of the Samnitians; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal's men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once: but was fain to catch advantages where he might get them; the Romans now being grown stronger in the field than he. The best way, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speed in many petty enterprises, to follow business of far less importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had been so long promised and expected. Thus they had done in better season, Rome it self might have been stricken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannae. But since that which is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himself to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masimilla was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain: whether when

when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his journey into Italy; of which there had been so long talk. These news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrify the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to prevent the threatening mischief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother: Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, lay near unto Herdonia, to get the Town by practice. It was not long, since, near unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great Marches thitherward; and came to Herdonia ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soon as he came, he offered battle to the Roman Prætor: who accepted it with more haste than good speed. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian Horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with twelve Tribunes or Centurions, were lost: of the common Soldiers that were slain, the number is uncertain; some reporting seven, others thirteen thousand. The Town of Herdonia, because it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the Multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thuriens and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheer; for that he would shortly abate the Enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian army: and overtaking him at Nimfro, in the Country of the Lucani, fought with him a battle: which beginning at Nine of the Clock in the morning, lasted until night; and ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain Victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia: whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes: but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the Enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battle, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum: which if he could win, like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Collegue, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the Command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to press the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himself, to deal with Hannibal in open Field. He followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battle, but upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight; but thought it enough to entertain his Enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong until the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus; nor brook the indignity of being daily brav'd. He therefore had his Men to be lusty, and to beat soundly this hotheaded Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quies; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battle: wherein Hannibal had the victory; took six Ensigns, and flew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men as Peasants, and base Cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did so vex them, that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the Enemy, than such displeasure of their General; they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies hither, that had lost their Ensigns the day before, had them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their shameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other Motives continued the same, and his Men had been heartened by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary, by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope: and the Enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battle Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so dear a rate, that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt the second night. For it eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slain, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battle, the difference was no greater, than even to recompense the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius, the Consul, hereby got leisure to follow his business at Tarentum, without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius, the other Consul, about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucani, and Vulcentis, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their Errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busie doers in the Rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian Thieves, which Levinus had lately brought from Agatena, was then also for on work to besiege Caulonia, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to dived Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius, the Consul, having taken Manduria, a Town of the Salernitan, late taken before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needful to carry it, either by assault, or long Siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine Wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof, he gave notice by Letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was, and her brother made the Consul acquainted with these news: and said, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Mistress, to do what he would have him. The Consul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, matter, willed his Souldier to convey himself into the Town as a Fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own persuasions, partly by the flattering entreaty of his Sister: willed him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the business, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept Watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night-time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City: especially about those parts of the Wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself, with the choice of his Men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate; whereas the Army was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as it hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democritus, and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage, in dying against the Romans. Carbalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the Sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force, and not by Treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Inageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in rich habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry Gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were fain to besake them to a Hill: which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first onrunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this: The Romans have also their Hannibals; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few days together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bewought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These Letters were sent by two young men of the same City: who did their Errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his Ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the Plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the famous Wolfingers were employed again: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their Wars: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they lost a Company of such luck fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, Twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered, that the Legions of Came, and those unhappy Companies, that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of Men, and impositions of Money: in every of which years, they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear, or rather the best which they could hope, was, to fall into the hands of the Enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently find home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to pass within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never did return. Such talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had molt compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of Twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans, their farther help. This was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, so long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Towns make such declarations, and profess their disability of giving any farther help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to return home, and bring a better answer; forasmuch as this, was none other than Treason: to such as this, was none other than Treason: they had them to consider, that their people were not Campanians, or Tarentines, but the offspring of the Romans; and no less partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not serve: the Embassadors continuing to profess, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither Men, nor Money. It was well for the Romans, that the other Eighteen Colonies did not imitate these Twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be laid upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration

Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livy would not endure to hear of this. He said, it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a diftinct man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases, he resisted their desires: till by persuasions, and Examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himself to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for shelter in a storm. Such unthankfulness, to well-deferving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous Multitude. Neither was the late Example hereto much unlike, of Philip the Second, King of Spain, his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to Prison, upon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Adrubal was already come into France, and waited only to have the ways of the Alpes thawed by warm weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of these which they had, four served in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia; the rest were so disposed, in several parts of Italy, where he needed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution, and would not be tied to the punctual observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not stir out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Adrubal; until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius, a Prætor of that year, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an addition to the Forces of Livius; to whom the War against Adrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salernitanæ, near unto Tarentum, under another of the Prætors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless the Consuls, by the especial instance of Livy, did obtain, that all might be left to their own discretion. For news came, that Adrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrey about Genoa, with their Neighbour people, were in readiness to join with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than he safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the City, each his several way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had been, when L. Æmilius Pau- lus, and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispart, and win the Victory betwixt; but rather they stood in fear, left all diligence, wisdom, and valour, should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slain; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst, the two Carthaginians would forthwith join, and make short work with the other: it seemed a greater happiness than could be expected, that each of them should return home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to find. With extreme difficulty had Rome held up her head ever since the battle of Cannæ: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himself. For, whereas in that long and dangerous March, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable; Hannibal had lost a great part of his Army: this Adrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees, at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations, and the like, of which, fear presented many unto them; caused it: People of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Town; like a pensive Train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus, upon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last year, but saw neither of them return alive, from a less dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstain from giving, or taking battle, until he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by seeing the overthrow of his own unjust Citizens, satisfy himself with the joy of a great, though not an honest, revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Adrubal received in Spain, by Scipio, a little before he took his journey into Italy; such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livy. Yet I think it not amiss to add in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his history, concerning that accident. Adrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain, by reason of those Captains that were sent from the City of Carthage, to join with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, such far forth Traitors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before that good of their Commonwealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindered his counsels undertaken, it cannot be known: since of those books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining, only a few broken pieces. But by the spiteful dealing of Hanno, in Sicily, with Adriaticus, a better man of War than himself, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island; we may conceive, that against the brother of Hannibal, it was thought needful, by these mischievous Partisans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more more earnest Malice. Nevertheless Adrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities as Mutines could not long digest. His Journey into Italy being resolved upon; he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far from the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio; and drove him out of his Camp, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could, or would, come to his assistance. The overthrow seems not to have been so great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to chole that. Rather it appears, that Adrubal dealt like a provident man: and seeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, sent away all his Money, with his Elephants before him: but staid behind himself to sustain the Romans a while, until his Carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken Troops together; and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him; and so passed over Tages. Then taking unto him the Forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his brother Mago, and to Adrubal, the Son of Gisco, that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Fain would Scipio have stopped him on his journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Adrubal took another way, or whether he forced the Guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly fails to no good effect) he was not clear in his Voyage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his Money, that no passages were defended against him, nor any fort of resistance made; but he, and his Army, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to Winter in their Countrey, whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountains likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journey over the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Adrubal, when he travelled through their Countrey. For these poor men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily perverted, that it was his purpose to rob them of their Cattel, and to make spoil of that little Wealth, which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate Rocks. But now in process of time they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mighty Cities, far disjoynted asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea: and that the Alpes did only lie in their way; they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The like affection, upon greater cause, was afterwards found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joined with Adrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Porcius, with his two Legions: of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Adrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the Enterprize: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure, to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Adrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leave his winning Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to fit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero, the Roman Consul, made what speed he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battle to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious March from the borders of the Salernitanæ, and Æquians, into the Countrey of the Brutians, there to increase his Forces; which were otherwise too weak for the journey intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unprofitably with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Venusia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Ausidus, to Cannus; where he far down, not far from the place in which he had obtained his most memorable Victory. There also did Nero sit down by him; and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well, that his brother might, with little impediment, overcome the way to Cannus: where if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman Forces together, he had reason to hope for such another Victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrey. If this had so fallen out, Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to with any second Victory, in the naked Champions about Cannæ; if such an Army, as this which Adrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did bear him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilst Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their succour; he was advertised of Adrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Adrubal had left the Siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livy the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joynted as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Adrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of so strong a War at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithful Associates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planers: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effect. It seemed apparent, that his Collague was unable to stay the progress of Afrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readiness, that could do service in such a needful case; excepting those that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himself to his own charge, which was the War against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more necessity required; and to carry part of his Forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Commonwealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust with that which was of the less importance. Six thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making them, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow-Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to pass, that they should be ready to meet him, with Victuals, and all other necessities for his Army. Livius, the other Consul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Afrubal within half a mile of him. In six days Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him, to give notice of his coming. Livy thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert until dark night, and then enter secretly into the Camp: left the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsels. This was done: and a token given, that the Centurions, Captains, and all Soldiers, as well Horse as Foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their own sort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Volunteers that joined with them on the way. Nevertheless, it was not needful, that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged, since they had brought with them nothing but their Arms. The next day they held a Council of War: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few days after their weary journey, before they should be drawn forth to battle. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Soldiers also of Nero, were full of Spirit; perceiving that the honour of the Victory was like to be theirs: so far as the battle would not have been undertaken, without their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Council brake up, that the sign of battle should be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat: or the Roman Pavillion.

Afrubal was no less willing than the Romans to come to battle: having long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his Men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance; it seemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their Arms and Horles, looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no Prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their Forces to be increased. The Camp, as hath been said, was not extended: but the Trumpet, that sounded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pizzor, did now, contrary to former custom, found twice in the quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Afrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman Orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to go leisurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own Forces, he had not cared to hinder, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himself perhaps with over-strongly fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation; he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night: intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himself as long as he could, from necessity of battle. But whether it were so, that his guides did steal away from him in the dark, so that he could not find the way to the Fords; or whether his Carriages were too heavy, and hindered his speed: far he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman Horles, and stayed him from passing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light Armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions, in good order, and ready for battle. Afrubal, seeing himself overtaken with necessity to fight, omitted no care and circumspection. His Gentils, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he stood himself, with his Africans and Spaniards: his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants he bestowed in the fronts of his battels. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battel. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to have fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the Victory seemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Soldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the less, or were able now to do, being placed in the midst. Livius therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain against a steep Hill, was unable to come to blows with the Gentils, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Afrubal the more confident; who seeing his own left wing safe, did the more boldly and hercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended, took a part of his Forces, and led them round behind the Forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compassed, he fell upon Afrubal, and charged him in the Flank. Here began the Victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in Front, ran all along the depth of Afrubal his battel: and falling upon the Skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of that side on every side, the greatest part was slain. The Ligurians and Gentils escaped as they could: and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive: the rest were slain; some by the Enemies Weapons, others by their own Guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, began to wax unruly, and rush back upon their own battels following them: the guide had in readiness a Mallet, and a Chizzele, wherewith he gave them a stroke between the Ears, in the joint of the neck, next unto the head; wherewith he killed the beast upon the sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the Squadrons following them, is said to have been the Device of Afrubal himself; who died in this Battel.

Great commendations are given to Afrubal, both by Polibius, and by Livy. He is said at all times to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Hannibal his Brother; to have striven with great patience, against many difficulties, wherewith he fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battel all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the loss irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thick of his Enemies; where fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battel, the report of Livy, and of Polibius, do very much disagree. For Livy saith, that the Carthaginians had no less an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannæ; that fifty six thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken Prisoners, and above four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had Captives with them, delivered, and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates, there were slain eight thousand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polibius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Livy reporteth it, for Afrubal came well stored with money. But Polibius (who had no desire to make this battel of Metaurus a parallel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian slain, and two thousand of the Romans to have been slain. The number of the Prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battel. Whereby it may seem, that they were all Barbines: so far as that they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Country, above their lives.

The joy of this Victory was no less in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it was known in what sort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman Forces, unto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that stayed behind, much weakened, and without a General? Thus did they talk: yet referring their venture unto the success, with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean while the People filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the Temples, with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in Council, waiting till ready at hand upon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every ones help. In brief, they were all to full of Melancholly, that when first news of the Victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not only great and joyful concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business; making contracts one with another (which they had long forbore to do) and attending their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Afrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African Prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had happened. These two Prisoners might have served well enough to certify Hannibal of this misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose Carcasses fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Commonwealth; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were far more civil, and less prone to the infelicity of revenge. The best Excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terror of such a Spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgave himself, being over-joyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battel of Metaurus that weighed down the balance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebb, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, withdrew himself into the Countrey of Britannia: and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend many places as he held at the present, because they lay too far asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass in the utmost corner of Italy; it being a Countrey of much fastness, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this business Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his Forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their Harvest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius, the other Consul, carried among the Cisalpine Gauls, until the end of Summer; there to let things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions ons that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was to have the honour of a Triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well known, what interest Nero had in the late Victory: order was given, that not only Li-ty, with his Army, should come home; but likewise Nero; though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of Triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof Livy made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the Victory was gotten; his Army also being present at the Triumph. But Nero, that rode on Horseback, and without such attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers: by whom, the Victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good service. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory, in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this year, which was the Thirtieth of the present War, until the Eighteenth year, wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruin, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himself upright. And surely very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius; whom Livy therein follows: That making War upon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained for many Victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks, which were, neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they never fell to Sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Livy adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry soil of the Bruttians: which, when it was bemurdered in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and virtue, he kept his Army in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatness of reward and booty: since after the death of Ardubal, he made no invasion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himself still among the poor Bruttians. Where we must leave him until he be drawn into Africa by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spain.

I. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAGO, and Ardubal, the Son of Gefco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Ardubal, the Son of Amilcar, departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a Voyage to the Balears; there to levy a supply of men; and Ardubal withdraw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his business, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the fame perhaps that had lately been employed in Sicily) who brought new Forces out of Africa, and came to succeed in place of Ardubal the Barcine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needful from Carthage; when that Son of Amilcar, whose authority had been greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it self, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appear, that things did prosper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the Field, and led Mago with him; as purposing alse to set upon the Romans. So he entered into the Country of the Celiberians, not very far from New Carthage: where, by Money, and other persuasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himself in the Eastern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may seem, to the proceedings of Ardubal, the Son of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers, to have sent part of his Forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius, the Consuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celiberians: he sent M. Syllanus, the Proprietor, with ten thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some Fugitive Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreymen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew near to these Celiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, instead of heartning and re-enforcing them, became partakers of the loss. Mago saved himself, with all the Horse, and old Companies of Foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten days journey brought them safe to Ardubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken Prisoner; though he kept himself out of the fight until all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into the Woods.

It could no otherwife be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, flood, by the coming thither of Ardubal. Ten thousand Foot, and Eighteen hundred Horse, he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his own Country: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at New Carthage, intentive to the necessity and success of his Countreymen at home. But when he had word of the great Victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had been sent over into Africa; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed Ardubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal, with his Army, was clofed up in a freight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the Will of the Victors. That it was the success of things in Italy, which gave such confidence unto Scipio, it is the more probable, because he took not this great Enterprize in hand, until the Summer was almost spent. Ardubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Army into many Garrisons; hindered the Enemy from doing any great Exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother, L. Scipio, took by assault the Town of Orma.

Against the next years danger, Ardubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor travel in strengthening himself for the trial of his last fortune in Spain. With seventy thousand Foot, four thousand Horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the Field: which number I believe that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a Multitude. Wherefore he judged it needful to use the help of his Spanish friends. But the Death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the Treason of such false Auxiliaries; made him on the other side very doubtful, of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Calpurn, that was Lord of Eight and twenty Towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse for his service: he resolved to make use of those, and some few others, that might help to make a shew, and yet not be able to do great harm, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, he sought out the Enemy; near to whom he incamped. At his first coming, Mago and Masani (a fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain Troops of Horse in covert: which breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly Retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betook themselves to plain fight. After this Encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmishes between the Horse, and light Armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Ardubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight; yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many days: Ardubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himself into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the Wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at far distance, many days together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same form; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before designed. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withal, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his Men, and Horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning, before day: and then sent forth his Horse and light Armature, to train out the Carthaginians, with their bellies empty: using herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battel of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the Wings; his Spaniards in the battel. Ardubal sent forth his Horse in all haste, to entertain the Romans; whilst he himself arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the Horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since being overpressed on either side, they had a safe Retreat unto their Foot; and one Troop seconding another by course, returned to charge. This Fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his Men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemy. But about noon he caused his Wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battel of Spaniards far behind them; that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries, that stood in Ardubal his Wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, levied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose: they were forely pressed; and with much difficulty made resistance. The Carthaginians would fain have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battel that was coming against them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the best part of Ardubal his Army stood idle, until the Wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he must have cast himself into the open space that lay before him, between the Roman Wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himself inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battel of Cannae. Wherefore he did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with Wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In process of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lusty; when the others began to faint with travel, and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gave not over, ill they had forc'd the Enemy to change his pace, and run from him. Adrubal did his best to have made an orderly Retreat; and afterward again, to have caus'd his men to turn head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the Victory to be exorcised from them: neither was it easy to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obdurate passion of fear, which hearkens to no persuasion. The Camp of Adrubal had that day been taken, if a storm of Rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caus'd them to give over.

The same night, Adrubal gave no rest to his men: but caus'd them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Soldiers. One Astanax, that was Lord of the Turdians, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this Example; and soon after, two strong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems, that the perverse fortune of this late battle, whereupon Adrubal had set his rest; bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Adrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himself, and march'd away, faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio follow'd the next morning; and overtaking the Carthaginians with his Horse, caus'd them to be taken to make stand, that they were at length attacked by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all kill'd to rout, save only seven thousand, that with Adrubal himself, recover'd a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. This place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessities to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continu'd hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolv'd to make shift for one: and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not far thence; he took shipping, and set sail for Gades. When Scipio understood that Adrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, to be siege their Camp (which was not taken in haste: for Mago and Masimilla play'd in it) whilst he with the rest of the Army, did what was needful in the Country abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masimilla follow'd Adrubal to Gades; and their Army dispers'd it self; some flying over to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Ulterior, Cafula, and Astapa; that made countenance of War against the Romans; of which only Cafula had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had sav'd themselves by flight, in the late overthrow. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Cafula follow'd long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a Wife in that City. For this was one of the last three Towns that held out, on the Carthaginian side. Ulterior had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the Death of the two elder Scipios, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but with great cruelty betray'd, and slew the poor men that escap'd thither from the overthrows. Astapa was a Town that had ill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriven by spoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went against these, and took himself Ulterior and Cafula: Ulterior by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Cafula, by Treason of one Cerdobellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was rais'd in the Market-place: whereinto was thrown all the gold and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a fire guard; that should kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This provision being made; all the Inhabitants that could bear arms, rush'd forth desperately: and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they were every one slain. Then was the Town forthwith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rush'd over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Adrubal, being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion, if any should be offered. He visit'd in his way home, Syphax, King of the Masæssis, a people of the Numidians, hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith betink himself, how to finish the War, by putting them to the like distress in Africa. Hereunto it seem'd, that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustain'd much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captain into Africa; who instructed him so well in marshalling his Forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made League with the City, in a time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, for which he intend'd in Africa; upon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Lelium his Embassador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring, that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain; easily persuad'd the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax request'd, that the Roman General should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was Neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquagena Gallies he took Sea: and arriv'd in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Adrubal. This would have been very dangerous to him, had he been discrib'd by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven, they forbore to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He

He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excus'd himself, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismiss'd Scipio, with whom he readily enter'd into covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

I. II.

Funeral Games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spanish Princes. A Digression, concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Ulterior, Cafula, and Astapa, as hath been said before. The Conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end: he performed at New Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vows that he had made; and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with Funeral games, especially of those that fought at Sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful, that he should trouble himself with preparing Slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enough, that either offer'd themselves as Volunteers, or were sent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their several Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controversies, to trial of the Sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corvus, and Orfus, Cousin-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corvus was the elder, and the elder brother's Son: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the House, after the manner of our Irish Tanistry. But the Father of Orfus took lately seiz'd of the Principality: which thought himself received by the Death of his elder brother; yet this his Son would not let it go back; but claimed to hold it as Heir unto his Father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answer'd preposterously, That all their friends, and kindred, had already labour'd in vain, to take up that quarrel; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battle, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillful at his Weapon, easily vanquish'd the fool-hardiness of the younger.

Such Combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy, by Thersites, Heracles, Pellus, and others: as also of two at the War of Troy; the one between Parus and Meneleus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there Examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliath; and others performed by some of David's Worthies, against those that challeng'd them; are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kind appertains the fight, between twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Benjaminites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curiatii, that were Albans. The Combat of Manlius Torquatus, and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challeng'd any

Roman; were of less importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought, between Edmond Ironside and Camusen the Dane, for no less than the Kingdom. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the Reign of Edward the Third, who sustained the party of Montfort against the Earl of Blois, contending for the Duchy of Britain; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, between Thirty of the Britains, and Thirty English: two of which English, were Cadogan, a brave Captain, and that Sir Robert Knolles; who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French Wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the Examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been Combats of bravery, and of gayereté de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of several Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of Combats; which are, either upon accusation for life; or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of Right. Of this of the latter kind was that, of which we spake even now, between Corvus and Orfus. Unto these (methinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the Combat upon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliath; or that between the Horatii and Curiatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a Combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Bedfordshire, Duke of Bedford, and Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. There was a Combat performed by Sir John Ashley, and one Carrington: whom Ashley charged with Treason; and prov'd it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Montfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also between a Navarrois, and one Welsh, of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accus'd of Treason: but, being beaten in fight, confess'd that he had belied him; and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our trial by battle do determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquish'd, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved, I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accus'd of Treason, or, according to the Customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by Death) be overcome, he shall suffer the pains appointed for those Crimes. In Combats for trial of Right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Lewis, or offered to do, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yieldeth, loseth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the Combats, upon accusation, or trial of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in campes close; that is, within Rails. Now this trial by Combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of St. Leues, and Philip the fair, his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiastical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Jurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the  Memoriall* of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accept'd, and after, by consent of the Lord, were de-ken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings fix pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this Custom grew the French Proverb, which they use when a man hath had an hard or unjust judgment; saying, that he was tried by the Law of Lorry, or Berne; ou le bairu pue l'omande, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battel, that great learned man Yvo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and especially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert, Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgment of their Churches, that had ratified such Challenges of Combat. But this liberty, and kind of trial, was retrencht by Saint Lezeus, and the Arch-bishop of Sens, so that no man should decree, or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carages against Jagues le Gris; and to Julian Romero, the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countryman: wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father of the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero, that had the Victory, and lastly to the Lord of Clobf. Now in those Challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death, (and in those only) the Rule held; That the defendant should tenu de proposer ces desseins per une demonst; The Defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did faiblement confesser le crime; flently confess the crime. But after such case as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a personal Combat: every party Champion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giving of the Lie Mortality it self; holding it matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put up, what the great Emperor, Charles the fifth, had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a Challenge of Combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, or the Objection and Retraiture upon Champions, or the Objection and Retraiture of capital Offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these days, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personal Combats: the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a Custom: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea, there are (among many other no less ridiculous) some so mystical curiosities herein, as that it is held, a far greater dishonour, to receive from an Enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword: the one, having relation to a Slave; the other to a Soldier. I confess, that the difference is pretty: though, for mine own part, if I had had any such Italianated Enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions, who are commonly, of all other, the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who pretend death on the points of their Swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and swear falsely. Yea, it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed, and sworn to pay the Monies, and other things they borrow, do they break their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of Word, or Bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay Money by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he failed; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what the professedion of love that men make now-a-days? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary Complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid good morning, or salute, other than a courteous and courtlike kind of lying? It is (saith a wise Frenchman, deriding therein the Apish Custom of the Country) une marche & complex pas ensemble le se mequer, mentir, & pper les uns les autres; A kind of Merchandize, and complex made among them, to mock, belie, and a rise each other; and so far now-a-days in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted, either dull, or Cynical. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complemental lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and fear: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a Vice, of all other, stiled the most villainous. But now for the Lie it self, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That who so gives another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more heinously promised, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himself a Liar. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lie, when himself knows, that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himself. And what cause have I, if I say, that the Sun shines, when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me, I lie, for it is mid-night; to persecute such an one to death, for making himself a foolish Ruffian, and a Liar in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life, gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreme rudeness to tax any man in publick with an untruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered) but all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were more, to admire and imitate a French Custom, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsel of God. But you will say, That these discourses favour of cowardize. It is true, if you call it cowardize, to fear God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies Sword we shall find ten thousand Seven-penny-men (waged at that price in the Wars) that fear it as little, and perchance less, than any professed Sword-man in the World. Diligentissima in tela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it self: It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pona: sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa: As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr; so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Country: as he may justly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in private Combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or punish the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our own consciences; animas, in vulnere ponere; And to draw our Souls in the Wounds and Blood of our Enemies. Hereupon you will again ask me, if I condemn in generous and noble Spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I say, that I do not; if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternal Law: and the Laws of all Christian Kings and States, do favour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will secondly ask me, Whether a Noble man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Carrels, by one of like quality, be not bound, in point of honour, to satisfy the challenger in private Combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to second the conquered victim in malice: I say, that he is both base, and a fool, that accepts of any Carrel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have seldom taken any such advantage over men of quality: who upon even terms have slain their private Enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; so did our Noble men and Gentlemen in former Ages, in all important injuries, sue unto the King, to approve themselves by battel and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law: so did they disdain to submit themselves to the shameful revenge thereof; the fame revenge (because it detesteth Murder) that it hath declared against a common Cur-purse, or other Thieves. Nay, let it be granted that a Pardon be procured for such offenders; yet is not the Man-slaver freed by his Pardon. For these two remedies hath the party grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by Battel, upon his Appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I use his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slaver) be convinced either by Great Assize, or by Battel, upon that Appeal; the Man-slaver shall die, notwithstanding the Princes Pardon. So favourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to Justice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen shall be repaired in Honour, whose Enemy, taking the start either in words or blows, shall lay on them an infamy unfixable? I say, that a Marhal's Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selves, for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands and for all things else, by which the lives of our selves, our Wives, and Children, are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may be Felony, to take by violence even that which is our own: why should we not submit our selves to the Judges of Honour in cases of Honour; because to recover our reputation by wrong hand, may be Murder? But yet again it may be objected, That the loss of Honour ought to be more fearful unto us, than either the loss of our Goods, of our Lands, or of our Lives; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be so dear unto us, other than a kind of hifory, or fame following actions of virtue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of virtue; because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equal in persons and arms: Neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; because the loss or mutilation of an able man, is also a loss to the Commonwealth.

Now that a Marhal of England hath power to save every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may sustain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to repent us of any ill words that we have given, and to confess that we have done him wrong to whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himself of them upon adveitment; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are indeed not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appear by a notable Example of a most worthy Gentleman, Monsieur du Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since, by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgment of the Constable, and Marshals of France, was this: In the open Court, wherein the Constable gave judgment, M. de Plessis was set in a Chair under the degrees where the Constable and Marshals sat: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a Sword, with the point towards himself, and in his left hand the like Cudgel, or Baffinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which Weapons he delivered into M. de Plessis's hands, submitting himself to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those Weapons; the Constable and Marshals having formerly left it to the will of Plessis to use his own discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himself, as one before-hand in point of honour, who struck M. de Pleſſis, like a Ruſſian, coming behind him, and (having advantage of company, and his Horſes ready) ſlided himſelf away on the ſudden; but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himſelf in this ſhameful manner; or whether Montſieur de Pleſſis (of whole valour no man doubted) had not juſt cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure have beaten or wounded his Enemy, but forgave him; let any wife man judge. To this if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion; that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no diſgrace unto him: I answer, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no diſgrace, in reſpect of the force, but in reſpect of the fact: which (but for our ſins to God) makes all repentance ſhameful; becauſe all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for ſome ſort unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honeſt man. Nay, voluntary repentance it ſelf, as it hath relation to men, ariſeth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgment of our own weakneſs. Certainly, as wiſe men, and valiant men, do rather deride petty injuries, or ſudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: ſo men, apt to quarrel, do commonly ſuſpect their own valour; and rather deſire, that thereby the World ſhould believe them to be of great daring, than know any ſuch reſolution in themſelves. For he that knows himſelf indeed to be a valiant man, ſcorns to hunt after the opinion.

Now the ſame power which the Conſtable and Marſhals of France have, hath alſo a Marſhal of England, or his Deputies; by whole judgment, in all diſputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preſerved; we may therefore alſo ſubmit our ſelves to the Judges of honour, in all diſputes of honour, as we do ſubmit our ſelves in all controverſies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the infliction of this Court of Chivalry in England, in France, and elſewhere, was no leſs charitable than poliſtick. For the blood of man, violently ſpilt, doth not bring forth Honey-bees, as thoſe Bulls doth, which Ring but the fingers, or the lace: but it produceth that monſtrous Beaſt, Revenge; which hath ſtung to Death, and eaten up of ſeveral Nations, ſo many noble Perſonages, as there is nothing more lamentable; nor more threatening the Wrath of God upon ſupreme Governors, than the permiſſion.

His Maſteſty therefore (which Henry the Fourth of France alſo endeavour'd) hath done a moſt Kingly and Chriſtian-like deed in Scotland, which the moſt renowned of all his Predeceſſors could never do: in beating down, and extinguishing, that hereditary proſecution of Malice, called the deadly feud; a conſeſt, which ſhall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly Power, for evermore. And we have cauſe to hope, that his Royal care ſhall be no leſs happy in preventing the like miſchief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outrageous vanity of Duelliſts.

Unto this that I have ſpoken of lying, and of man-lauſhter, it muſt be added, That each of theſe are of great Latitude, and worthy of re-proof and vengeance proportionably, more or

leſs, in their ſeveral degrees. There is much difference between Lies of neceſſity, upon breach of promiſe, or complemental lies; and ſuch pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by falſe Witneſſes: the former fort, being excuſable by weakneſs or love; the latter, being altogether deſecable. No leſs, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in an open field, with even Weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo, or per inſidias; though our Laws do not much diſtinguiſh them in puniſhment. For in the latter, God, forſaking his own privilege, commandeth, that the guileful Murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guileful murder performed by the Sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guileful murder alſo, by poiſoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For ſuch diſtinction is found, between committing preſumptuouſly upon a man, to ſlay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cauſe, upon hope of ſpoil, after the ſame manner as the net is ſpread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the fiſt, Queen Mary of England, and the King's Maſteſty now reigning, have given notable teſtimony of their Juſtice, upon three Noble men, who committed guileful murder. Of the fiſt kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Talar: who being (ſaith the French Hiſtorian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & ſupporte de pluſieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineages, and ſupported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in eſpecial favour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hang-man. Queen Mary, upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other reſpects very dear unto her. His Maſteſty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whole houſe was no leſs ancient and faithful, than himſelf valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poiſon, and of puniſhment following ſuch wicked Artifices, every Age hath had too many Examples. Of guileful killing by the pen (that I may not ſpeak of any English Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives us two notable inſtances: the one of the Elthars, who (ſaith Paſquiere) ſit mourir Montaigu grand Maître de France, pour contente l'opinion de celui dont il eſtoit lors ſecrétaire; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut p. n. & eſtrangle; Who cauſed Montaigu, great Maſter of France, to die, to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elthars worſhipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himſelf was ſoon after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the great Francis the fiſt, upon his Chancellor Poyer: who, to ſaſtifie the King's paſſion, practiſed the deſtruction of the Admiral Chabot, a marſt moſt noble deſcended, and of great ſervice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings, the paſſion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the King's affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with ſome Offences which he had formerly committed. The Admiral, preſuming upon the great good ſervice which he had done the King in France, and in the defence of Marſailles againſt the Emperor, gave the King other language than became him; and deſired nothing ſo much as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to provoke an ill diſpoſition) gave Commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Preſident, and other Judges, upon an information of the King's Advocate, to queſtion the Admiral's life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large confidence, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Judges with ſo great cunning; with others, with ſo ſharp threats; and with the reſt, with ſo fair promiſes; as, albeit nothing could be proved againſt the Admiral, worthy of the Kings diſpleaſure; yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to prevail againſt his Life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King having falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (ſaith Paſquiere) à tout Juge pour demorer juſticier enſoy, & ne laſſer ſuſciter la conſcience dedans les autres; & une imaginative faveur, qui pour fin de ieu le ſuſmerge; & ſerv leſſon to all Judges, to dwell always in themſelves, and not to juſtifier their conſciences to ſtand upon the waves of imaginative favour, which in the end overwheles them. And as for the Admiral: though it might have been answered unto his friends, if any bewailed his calamity, as undeſerved, that he was tried, according to his own deſire, by the Laws of his Countrey, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the King's Juſtice, ſurmounting all other his Paſſions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Eſtate.

†. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is choſen Conſul.

THE laſt buſineſs that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the Rebellion of the People, and Mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously ſick, in ſuch ſort, that the rumor of his Death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a-while before, to take Arms againſt the Romans. They were vainly perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themſelves ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spain. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatness of their hopes, they thought it beſt, to take the preſent advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they raſhly fell upon the Suſſetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans, and waſted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sacro, inſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of their Roman Conqueſts, as might ſaſtifie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the Death of Scipio was reported; they thought, that the time ſerved very well, to enrich themſelves with ſpoil of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed; and, which was greater of all, driving away their Colonels, that ſhould have bridled their fury; they choſe out of their own number, two baſe fellows, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to be their Commanders. Theſe took upon them all the Enſigns of Proconſuls, or Proprætors; as if their Election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was choſen by the Souldiers, after the Death of the two Scipios. But whilt they were deviſing, what Exploits they might do, for the enriching of themſelves, in a time of ſuch combustion, as was expected; there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeemingly to be glad, that they had no further over-thought themſelves, led them to Carthagina, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had reſolved to do exemplary Juſtice on the principal Offenders; and to put the whole Multitude of them in fear of what they had deſerved. Therefore he cauſed Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition againſt Mandonius, and Indibilis. He cauſed Albinus and Atrius, with ſome thirty other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their Lodgings; He called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus, and his Companies, prepared for the purpoſe; he bitterly inveighed againſt them all, as Traitors. This done, Albinus, and Atrius, with the other Priſoners, were haled to the ſtake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman Cuſtom toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their Oath of Obedience a-new; and received every man his pay when he was ſworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis, continued in Arms; notwithstanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the ſeverity uſed to the Roman Souldiers; they ſtood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater Offenders, of harder meaſure. Scipio went againſt them; and found them in a Valley, that was ſcarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them; and ſending Laſinus, with all his Horſe, to ſearch a compaſs about the Hills, and charge them in Rear; he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to preſerve themſelves and their Eſtates, otherwiſe than by making ſubmiſſion. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly craving pardon, both for himſelf, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his requeſt; yet ſo, that they were taught to acknowledg themſelves leſs free Princes than they formerly had been.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades; and was met on the way by Maſaniſſa, who ſecretly promiſed to do him all ſervice, if the People of Rome would ſend him to make War in Africa. Unto Mago, that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spain alone, he ſhould thence depart with his Fleet into Italy; and there was an Army of Gauls, and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpoſe, was Money ſent unto him from Carthage; and he himſelf laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without ſparing either private men, the common Treſury, or the Temples. In his Voyage thence, he landed at Carthagina; hoping to have taken it by ſurpriſe. But he failed in the attempt; and was ſo beaten to his Ships, that he returned back to repoſe himſelf a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the Robberies and Spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not ſuffer him to enter again into their City. By this he foreſaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore ſending Meſſengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiſtrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the Excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended Voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Life and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: and himself with ten Ships returned home. At his coming to Rome he made full for the honour of a Triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this refusal: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the City P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joined with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custom of those times, go far from the City; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were fabled by no such religious impediment, from being far, and long absent. Hereby it came to pass, that Scipio desiring to have the War transferred into Africa, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so far off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make War in Africa. His preparations. Of Manilla who joined with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the Money which he had brought out of Spain into the Treasury; upon the setting forth of solemn Plays, that he had vowed to make, whilst he was busy in his Spanish Wars. This helped well to revive the Memory of his Victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the War, which he intended to make in Africa. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassadors avail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservedly; saying, That they were the most happy of all their Countrymen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyful news. The Saguntine Embassadors, were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africa might be decreed unto him for his Province: there wanted not many, even of the Principal Men, that vehemently gainst him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who seems to have been troubled with that dislike; which too often causeth men renowned for long approved virtue, to look askant upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kind. He alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chief were, That the Treasury was unable to sustain the charges of a War in Africa; and that it was extremely perilous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled, unto the defence of Rome it self; if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his Brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said)

be greater in setting Italy free from Enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africa. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spanish Wars, as of less moment than the intended voyage against Carthage; nor to withhold to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Asdrubal to pass into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good success of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africa to be that year a Province: which the Consul nevertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted upon this one point: That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive War: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by help of Money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africa, for defence of his own home: and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter again unto the Senate. Much alteration there was about the manner of his proceeding: so far much as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who resented in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancy, which, in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himself wholly unto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained such much, That the Life of Sicily might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

Want of Money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the War, by him intended upon Africa. Herewithal it fell out, that Mago, coming on the suddain from the Baleares to Genna, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no less terrible invasion upon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civil Wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesome business, though it occupied more of his time, than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unsteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy, and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) too laden with the booty that he had taken; and given to the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disabill him: and though after a while, there came some letters from Carthage, together with store of Money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into into Africa, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lucina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punic, and Greek letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelessness; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great pestilence, infecting both the Carthaginians, and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness: which fell not out much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvelously empowered by this War; and had already cried the utmost way to delay the charges, which grew importunate. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loss; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, unto the detectors of Lands concealed.

Of this, or other Money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make prets of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he overmuch labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councils of Estate; that the buse, or obdurate heads of a few, do carry all the rest. And many times, men make a surrender of their own judgments, to the wisdom that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often find himself deceived: the counsel of those many being wholly directed by the temper of a few, that over-throw the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature sorted well with the business, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy above seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the several Towns; Corn, Iron, Canvas for Sails, Axes, Bead-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements, fir for building of Ships, many thousands of Targets, Helms, and Spears of all kinds: every place furnishing him with that commodity, which it best could afford. Unto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty days, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanced, twenty Triremes, and ten Quinquemes Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicily. In Sicily he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy censure. They had served under Marcellus, and Levius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africa;

where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his Horse, he prested three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young Men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilst he was providing, to have things in a readiness for Africa; the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts Men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Town) being taken Prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which sent to Hannibal for aid. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their own paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen, were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison, but much more against Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate, to make present amends to the Goddes for this Sacrilege: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint; comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principal offenders, whom they cast into Prison, and used according to their desires: as also they restored unto Proserpina her Money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully harkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to run on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against the disloutness of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicily, neither mindfull of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicily, together with the Prætor appointed for that Island; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his Journey; and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africa; rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of War. He took a great booty: and struck

But Scyphus, in whose great aid and succour was reported more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poor Macanilla, sent an Embassage into Sicil about the same time, in which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excus'd himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuse but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and Reigned; and for the defence of his beloved Wives Country, if it woud be invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain neutral: so long as the Romani and Carthaginians held War abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hailestone Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perfavision could have done: For the promised assistance of Scyphus had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardness of many Adventurers to leave therefore the failing of that hope was not so great a change, as in common opinion was thought it be: but was to prevent all discouragement, and for the War undertaken immediately on foot, and the Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with Letters from their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what he had promised he had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together, and bad them make ready for the voyage; which he intenc'd no longer to defer. For, said he, Macanilla hath been with Lelæus; and Scyphus hath newly sent to me; greatness wondering upon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will provide for themselves, if I fail in their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors; whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syraculæ. And left any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his Fleet unto Lilybæum: and requesting by Letter M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; haisted thither with his Army. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the dividing of the Legions between them; which to do he was hind for defence of the Island; and to march to carry with him into Africk. Whither he afterwards transported, it is not certain. For Historians reckon only ten thousand foot, two hundred and twenty thousand Horse, three hundred thousand and thirty thousand, Horse and Foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging

This Roman Army landed in Africa, near unto a Fore-land then called the fair Promontory; which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point-of the Compass I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercury and lay to the North-east of Carthage, or whether that of Sylla, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and to the West. The coming of Malcaniss unto Utica at his first arrival, helps to confirm the opinion of Nylander: who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the fame, that was also called Mer-curies Cape, since with little difficulty Malcaniss might come thither from the lesser Syrus, where-about was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment, soon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed with in the Promontory of Apoll; whence the way to Utica was not long. This is also strongly proved for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred Horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it hard for Malcaniss, that roved about the Country with a Troop of Horse, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as beforehe had met with Lelins in Hippo, that was farther off: as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to over-come the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great company to Utica by Land; when he might have disembarked nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, that Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrus;
 since he gave charge to the Masters of his Ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to flape their course for that coast. The Country thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Army:
 neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Malcaniss had signified unto Lelins, when he spake with him at Hippo; thinking that the Romans howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only he served to invade the Lands of Carthage, but threatened a Conquest of the City, and whole Eftate then might he better advise them to set Sail for Utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their own Doors.

make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen General. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the Troop of Carthaginian Horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landing; and slain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians; wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand Prisoners; all which he conveyed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back laden into Sicily. He took likewise a Town called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Nimidian Horse; whose service being fitter for the Field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Malanisla before him: who rode up to the Gates; and, by making a Bravado, trained out the imprudent Hanno forth; that he drew him unto a place, where the Romani lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten; and Hanno either taken or slain. With those that fled, the Romani entred pell mell into the Town; which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, * of which ^{Lib. 6. cap. 2. & 3.} mention hath been formerly made; and faredown before it. Forty days he spent about it: affailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his Engines of Battery, wherein he had plenty; yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortify his Winter Camp; which would be well fared against the year following. Whilst thus needfully urged him to leave Utica; and thence of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better success, caused him to stay there; Adrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Adrubal had made a Levy of thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romani, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse: which joining unto the Forces of Adrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occasion to dilodge. He chose for his Winter-camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His Foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joining to the Continent by an Arm of Land: his Horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottom of the Creek he moored his Ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole Camp he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the year, when it should ferve him again to fight. Of Cattle and other Booty Malanisla had brought in great store; by driving the Country, before the coming of Adrubal and Syphax. Corn also he had gotten some; and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise Apparel for his Soldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to ferve turn; for that it was a matter of more cost. The Ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his Booty, as he could best spare; especially with his Captives, to be sold for Slaves. Adrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romani; either for that they wanted the severe instruction, which the Romani used in discipline of War; or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action. Q. Q. Q. When and provoked him to Battle in those Plains. That if they could do so, they hoped to make his Council of War repent as greatly the refusal of Peace, as did M. Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained that to besiege him? and that they themselves were well able to do by Land, and Carthaginian Fleet should do by Sea, and making way for the purpose. By such discourses that they comforted themselves; recompensing in conceit the loss of their hopes, partly with that of Victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, confuting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in their flame negligence, which was grown upon them by the long discourse of Peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle but made preparation out of hand, and did so to do somewhat against Utica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready; and appointed to take the same piece of Ground, where he lay against Utica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest he being suspected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Utica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behind him in his Camp. He called his Men that night to sup well and betimes, that they might be ready for the Journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit unto the defence of his Camp; all the rest of his Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles, and an half: whom he purposed to undertake himself with the one half of his Army; the other half he committed unto Laelius and Masaniila, whom he sent before him to fix upon the Camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning that the Camp of Syphax should be on a light fire, he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seem to have taken hold; or casually upon the Numidians, that lay farther off; whereas if it first appeared in the Camp of Adrabal, it would be suspected as the doing of Enemies; and give Syphax warning to look unto himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and softly: that Laelius and Masaniila, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compass about for fear of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the Camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himself, imputed unto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, some, starting half asleep; and others, that had risen up late at drinking; ran out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the rumolt, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were; nor give remedy to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire fell upon the Enemies Sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masaniila, that best knew the Country, did great execution upon them; having laid all the ways by which they foretold that they would seek to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this, thought none other than that it was a pitiful mischance: so that some ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would serve to quench the Scipio, putting himself into the next Town that was well fortified; thought there to find the Romans weary, until the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Town; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place, very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight or to yield. Un-to this Disputation, he well foresaw that the arrival of Scipio would soon give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seek the Victors favour by delivering him up; he thrunk away betimes and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Town, which he left, it opened the Gates to Scipio, at his first coming; and thereby preserved it self from all manner of loss. The two next Towns adjoining would needs be valiant, and make countenance of War: but their strength not being answerable, they were soon taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Soldiers. This done, he returned to the siege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they largely hoped for, they heard news of such a lamtable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make hasty provision for the future: but how to do it, few of them saw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others to fend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the loss of this Army, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially if Syphax, would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, They should bend all their care this way: levying in all haste another Army; and sending Embassias to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abon, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortuate Commander, Asdrubal, the Son of Gisco was implored to raise new levies of Men; and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her Husband Syphax, who having gathered together as many as he could, of his Subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophonisba laboured for with her Husband, that at length the won him to her own desire. And it fell out at the same time that four thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians; were brought over to serve in Africa. Of these were made such brave reports; as fit their courage, and the Arms which they used, were not to be refuted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Country of Spain had been twice conquered, first by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these Tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lye; saying that there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence the people of Carthage and their friends, gathered such spirit, that in thirty days they made up an Army consisting well near of thirty thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great Fields, about five days journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this came from Utica thither, to visit them: leaving behind him his impediments, with some part of his Army; to make a shew of continuing the Siege. Two or three days, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now been time for Asdrubal to follow the Example of the Roman Fabius; and seek to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a far worse Commander, or else it was not in his power, to give such directions as best pleased himself. The fourth day the Armies met in Battle: wherein the Romans were marshall'd by Scipio after their wonted manner; having their Italian Horse in their right wing; and Malansia with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left, and the Spaniards the Barrel. The Victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Malansia. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even till they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserv'd of them; than upon any likelihood or conceit of Victory. This their obstinacy was beneficial unto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Adrubal and Syphax escaped: Adrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his own Kingdom: whether his Wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastery of the field, took counsel about the prosecution of the War. It was resolved upon, as the best course. That he himself, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Malania, with his Numidians, and Laelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax, not permitting him to take rest within his own Kingdom, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice it seems that Malania gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a Victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his own Kingdom, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no less concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himself. According to this order concluded, Laelius was sent away with Malania; and Scipio stayed after Syphax, carrying the War from Town to Town. Many places yielded for fear: many were taken by force; and all the Subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the War in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their Enemy: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Towns: neither durst they make bold to trouble their own Subjects with any violent exaction of Men or Money: who nevertheless of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them, to find for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, that Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to set out a Fleet against that of Scipio; that rode before Utica, weakly manned, and easy to be taken, whilst Scipio himself was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principal care, to fortify by all means the City of Carthage: upon the safety whereof they said, that all depended; adding, that whilst they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doublet) would present them. These counsels were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman Fleet at Utica. Nevertheless it was considered, that hereby they should only protract the War: without any way advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of Victory; no, though it should fall out, that all the Ships at Utica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come over into Africa, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Council was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some to fortification of the Town: some to make ready the Fleet: and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embark themselves for Italy. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a City in those days very strong; and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible place adjoining, he easily took; the Garrison forsaking

it, and running away, as soon as he drew near. But whilst he was about there to encamp, and fortify himself against the City; he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Utica. What this meant, he readily conceived: and stood in great fear, lest his own Ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily laden with Engines of Battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assailing the Town) should make bad resistance, against a Fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Utica, to assist with his presence in this needful case. It fell out well, that he had sent his Carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time; if the Carthaginians had used such diligences as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarried a while to make a bravado: preferring themselves in order of battle, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea; it should little avail the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherefore he took his Ships of burden, and, fasting them together with Cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a fourfold bridge over the Channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting Weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left; whereas his Frigots, and other small Vessels might run out, and back again, upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks; using the Masts and Yards of his Ships instead of Rafters, to join all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge itself not be torn asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans, that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assailing of a Wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their Weapons downwards with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots and Long-boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss which followed. They that stood upon the bridge, were neither able to relieve them: nor yet could freely bestow their Weapons among the Carthaginians, as before, for fear of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the Enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron Chains. These they threw upon the Masts and Yards, which served as Arches to join the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one Ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of Ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away six Ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their wellwillcom was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, only this Exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Laelius and Malania, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, reitred Malania to his Kingdom, without further contention: the Malagis, his Subjects, joyfully receiving him; and forsaking the Ulurper. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of Men and Horles, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Adrubal and Sophoniba, he prepared again for War. But beside the infatigation of his beloved Wife; the loss of the Malagis would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Laelius and Malania, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no less unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to think all alike their own, whereof they are in possession, is the title unto some part never to unjust. Hereunto alludes the Fable of the young King; which thought that she had vomited up her own guts; when it was only the garbage of some other Fowl, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young King, believed the Kingdom of the Malagis to be part of his entrails: Laelius and Malania will shortly give him somewhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so far. It concerned the Romans to dispossess (if it might be) that King; whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good Offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Malania knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortunes of a battle is enough, to translate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax: who came against them with no less an Army than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago sent unto him out of Spain, from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men, how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a Rable of all sorts, gathered up in haste: and few of them had seen the War before. Encamping near unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troops of Horle on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to displease his men, by taking any foil at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his Horle, which were the best part of his Forces, and therewith over-charged Malania, whose numbers were far less. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troops of Horle; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their Battle standing now more firm than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Malania likewise, and his Troops, grow confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian Horle, that they began presently to disband. Fain would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end, made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was cast from his Horle, which received a wound; and so taken Prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled: and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Malania told Laelius, That this Victory should make an end of the Numidian War, if presently they hasted away to Cirta, the chief City of the Kingdom; whether he himself desired to be sent before with the Horle, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Laelius agreed. Malania coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parley: wherein by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to give his favour, that was like to be to his King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophoniba yielded her self into his hands; and vehemently besought him, that the might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her Youth, and excellent Beauty, so commended her suit, that Malania forthwith granted it: and to make good his promise, married her himself that very day: thereby to prevent Laelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his Wife. But Laelius, when he came thither, took the matter heinously; so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax, and other Prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over-entreated by Malania, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax, and other Captives immediately; following shortly after himself, with Malania, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the Field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Adrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortunes; ministering to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make War upon them unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his Wife had moved him so to do: calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Malania was no wifer than himself; since he had now taken the same woman to his Wife, who would shortly draw him to the same course. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Malania, as she had done of Syphax. It was no longer, ere Malania and Laelius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Malania apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophoniba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head: and that she was a mischievous Enemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the the memory of his great services already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded, to his own contentment) by committing a great Offence upon little reason. Maianilla bluffed, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio; whom he nevertheless entreated, to think upon his Faith given to Sophoniba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his, that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes then used to have in readiness, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live): and tempering a potion for Sophoniba, sent it unto her with this Message; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his Wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yield thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, the only said, That if her Husband had no better Token to send unto his new Wife, the must accept of this; adding, That the might have died more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her Funeral. And herewithal the boldly drank off the Poyson. Thus Livy reports it. But Appian varies from this: and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before, concerning the pre-contract between Maianilla and Sophoniba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Laelius and Maianilla upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophoniba, for her own private, sent Messengers to excuse her Marriage with Syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Maianilla readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to Wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perfwasion Sophoniba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Maianilla at his return; and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Maianilla said, she was his own Wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said, it was no reason, that Maianilla should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom the might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her; wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithal he sent to fetch her away: and Maianilla accompanied the Messengers, as it were to deliver her; but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body; which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Maianilla his love, and the ready consent of Sophoniba to marry with him; add not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the

Lib. 28. want of all other evident cause (which Livy notes) of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians; under whom he had been trained up, and done them great service. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Maianilla, and comforted him as well as he could; lest his Melancholly should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashness, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gave unto him a Crown of Gold, with other Royal Ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more cheerful contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour, though Maianilla well deserved: yet would not the Tide have redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Countrey, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seems not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these Wars, and sustained himself, with his Troop of Horse, in such fort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper Inheritance, by the love of his own Subjects, without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdom, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in safe, to make a Conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withal among the Numidians, as being (for the Masæsis were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching upon his Neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they, the Son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some piece of his Father's Kingdom, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithal, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punctilious herein; and answered very gravely, That it was not their custom to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they Lib. 13. made it a matter of State: and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary Prerogative, that they impured as a singular benefit unto Kings, that no way depended upon them, the satisfaction with any other favour or profit these re-

The Carthaginians desire Truce: and break it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good friend Syphax; and understood that Maianilla, their mortal Enemy, had got possession of his Kingdom. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes, in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither Forces, nor Courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto him thirty Embassadors, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Council, to make suit for Peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the feet of him, and of those that sat in Council with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio, and the rest, that, in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a Monument of their Clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barbians: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his Company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for Peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power: for they would not have made such adoration unto the Romans, in their own necessity, unless they themselves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had Money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrustful the Walls of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africa, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace; yet having the Conquest, as it were, in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace, which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making War, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these: That they should render up unto him all Prisoners and Fugitive Slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaul: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Island between Italy and Africa: That they should deliver up all their Ships of War, save Twenty; and that they should pay a great sum of Money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three days: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Maianilla was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdom, as if the War had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Laelius unto Rome: where the fame of these Victories filled men with joy; and gave hope that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an Holy-day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their Gods. Laelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Maianilla: who gratulating the happy success of the Romans in their African War, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his Subjects, and Prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him; who by rendering them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his Reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Maianilla in Complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him; they called him King again; and released his Numidians that were Captives; and sent him two Purple Cafocks, that had each of them one gold button; with such other Presents, as in time of their Poverty might serve to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Laelius gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire Peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without; until Laelius being sent for, came back from Offia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The Errand of these Embassadors, was Peace: but the meaning of them, and of their City, was only to win time, and get respite from War, until Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africa, or to obtain Peace for Carthage, by terror of their great Names and Armies, upon more easie Conditions. Wherefore they made an idle Discourse of the League that was concluded between them and Lucius Cornelius, at the end of the former War. This League, they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any War at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that, adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so: their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Cornelius, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this Tale; hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of a War, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made with Lucius; and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gain time, until they might repair the War. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Laelius; without any conclusion at all of Peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed be-unto conclusion. This may with good reason be believed: since it was not unknown, that the War continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertain issue of one Battle between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africa were no better than quite lost.

Matres thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came back from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred Ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africa to visit the Roman Camp, was overtaken by foul weather at Sea; and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of Victuals in Carthage: which caused the People to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them; saying, that the danger of Famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery: and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the Rascality, together with Women and Boys, to be meddling in uprons: the clamorous of the Boys being in such Tumults no less violent, than of the Men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman Ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station where their Camp adjoynd) and bring them unto Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loss, and for that the Town was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the War, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors unto them: both to require satisfaction for the injury done, and to deter them from entertaining any other hope, than in the Peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we bid it strange, That ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, and kissed our Feet, after an unusual manner of humility, confessing your selves to have perfectly broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selves worthy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal that thus emboldens you. Yet were we not averse, that ye should consider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians: where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stir: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africa, and ready to give us Battle: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a Man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome; what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will ye either swear by, to be believed, or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gesture will ye benefitful use, to move compassion? Surely ye have already wasted all your forces of persuasion, and shall not again deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, wherewith at the present ye are capable. It is no marvel though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the general opinion of the City, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his Faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all justification of matters past. And indeed it seems, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yielded unto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrel. But the Carthaginians took this in ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the Men, who had used unto them such infant Speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very reverence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberal words. So they were diffused in friendly sort; though it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Convey home: though with little intent of good unto their Persons. Asdrubal was then in the midway, as Men sailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by public order, to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Convey, having brought them on the way, as far as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so took leave of them, as if they had been then in safety; since the Roman Camp was even in sight. The Embassadors took this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell upon them in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was, to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquere, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gally of Asdrubal; they slip away, and made him overshoot himself. Yet he gave them chase; and had well near surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shore over against them, and therefore adventured to run their Vessel aground: whereby they saved their own Lives; though a great part of their Company were slain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the War; that thereby they might be driven to study nothing else, than how to get the Victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fear, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for Peace, would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Truce: had they not been given to understand, that Hannibal was already Landed in Africa, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perwaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what fort Hannibal spent the time after the Battle of Metaurus. The doing of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversely affected by Hannibals departure.

Ever since the loss of that Battle at Metaurus, Hannibal, remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded unto Claudius and Licinius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindered by the pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Servilius Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitless. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief Enemy was become, not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africa, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the Brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls: to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians; and found them to ready to stir in his behalf, that if he could have entered their Country strong, it might have proved no less needful for Scipio to return home out of Africa, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls, or Proconsuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was uncertain, upon which side Mago would break out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readiness for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Praetors. With these he fought a Battle, wherein though his virtue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in such fort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Praetor, taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if at that brunt the Victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the Service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, scent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the Troops that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shower of Darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But these Gauls discharged their parts very ill: They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his Men began to shrink, He put himself in the head of his Army; and held them to well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his Thigh; wherewith shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his own Men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: so the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand Enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Proconsuls Legions: also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark, that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any Prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant Sons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago withdrawing himself (by easie journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Army; but died of his wound about Sardania, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to return into Africa. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their Errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long ago done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply, that should have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the beels: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overbels the House of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruin of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readiness, doubting that, which after came to pass: wherein he embarked, besides his own Men, as many of the Indians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that thrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he flew; nor sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countries to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore: accusing both Gods and Men; and cursing his own dulness, in that he had not led his Army from Cannæ, nor bloodied as it was, directly unto the Walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the news of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) less earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought unto the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgiving unto their God's; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped, was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian Prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendered back unto the Saguntines that had furnished it. Upon like consequence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those Monies, that had been borrowed in time of more necessity from private Men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement, laid upon those twelve Colonies, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very mozt of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the Battle at Metamura; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few days since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolve a thousand fearful matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For berinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syllax and Ardubal no speciality of such great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of General, followed by other manner of Men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of half Scillions, that were good for nothing; being himself a fit Captain for such Soldiers. Likewise Ardubal, the Son of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was only good at leaving himself by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army, of Men hardened from their Childhood with incredible patience, felled many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoils not only of good Soldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talk told of the People of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in Battle, with many that had slain Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their own hands, with many, that had been first in getting over the Trenches of several Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the Siege of Towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as had ever served in War, and following the dreadful Name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about Peace in vain; leists a Battle at Nadagara, and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for Peace. Of the Peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Army at Lepcis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercury, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, somewhat far from the Enemy; that he might furnish himself with this and the like needful helps, against the day of Battle. From Lepcis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Country; gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syllax, was laid to have in those days the best Horse of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masanißsa, by their countenance and help to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian Town thousand Horse. Aprian further adds, that Mecetulus, (the same who had made himself Protector over Masanißsa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought unto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermis the Son of Syllax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assail the places that yielded obedience to Masanißsa. This Vermis, as we find in Livy, came with more than sixteen thousand men (for he lost more than fo many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been so base, as to make humble fly unto the Romans for Peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by War.

But

But when they behought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further procrastination, to do what he could out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Army: but since he was General of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to do as a General ought to do; and to choose his own times. Nevertheless, to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to their Embassadors: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masanißsa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other business a part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanißsa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdom. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his own forces would little avail him; if Hannibal should catch the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking fresh order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his own Kingdom; with four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius: who brought them safe into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their own heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion, M. Bæbius, one of the late Embassadors that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them, and detained them; sending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coin, for the injury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Bæbius to use them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victory) far less honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to sack, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the Sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to work such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to do, they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies alunder, as Men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their prædise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revenged minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought unto Scipio: who instead of trusting them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them up and down, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gave them liberty to depart; and sent them away safe unto their General. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to have an Enter-view, and personal conference; and signified so much unto him, by a Messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that he would meet him shortly in place convenient. The next day Masanißsa came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him removed unto a Town called Nadagara; near unto which he sat down, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a Water that might opportunely serve his Camp. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginians, That the time and place did fully serve, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the Enemy: where he encamped well to his own good liking in all things else; excepting that his Men were driven to take much pains, in fetching their Water somewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a Troop of Horse, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a peice of ground, which was before well searched, for fear of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countries of Sicily and of Spain, about which their Fathers and themselves had driven, were no sufficient recompence of so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had been shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, that it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreme dangers their own Cities had been exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make an end of their obfinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his own years, and long trial of Fortune both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are subject. For (said He) mine own example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ won the greatest part of Italy: and deified with my self, what I should do with your City of Rome; which I hoped verily to have taken.

Once

Once I brought mine Army to your Walls, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage; but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant us Peace. This may serve as a document of Fortunes instability. I fought with thy Father Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generals, that ever met me in the Field. I did then little think; and the time would come, that I should have fought myself, as now at the present, with his Son. But this is even one of Fortunes Payments, whereby she hath many. And thou must have experience of the like in thy self, who knowest how soon? Think upon M. Attilius. If he would have hearkened unto such persuasions, as I now use to thee; he might have returned home to Rome an happy man. And so might thou do now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How sayst thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, and whatsoever Islands else are situated between Italy and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left unto the Romans, to bear Dominion therein? Thou shalt have Glory enough by effecting this much, and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for as our own quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little; I must desire thee to ponder well how great we hazard thou must undergo, for the obtaining of a very little more, than that which thou must have without contention. It is now in thine own power, to lay hold upon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night, and thou must take such Fortune, as it shall please the Gods. The issue of Battel is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steel will each of us bring into the Field: but of the Victory, neither of us hath assurance. Let us therefore without more ado make Peace: And do not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in this Treaty: It is I Hannibal that now desire Peace with thee; which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking it expedient I will always maintain it: like as I have maintained unto my Power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the War by me begun. Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicily and in Spain, which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Memories, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their Confederates, had caused them to put on those Arms; which the Gods had approved, and would approve to be most just. As for the mutability of Fortune: he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed were already won from them by the Romans? If laid he, these Conditions had been propounded whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the Case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of thine former demands; to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to deal graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining Peace upon so friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Only thou must think, that in like sort it concerns me in Honour, not to let them be gainers or losers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that, besides those offers which thou hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom for all Prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliver Hostages for assurance of fair dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadors? Not so: But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then will I take advice with my Council what answer to give you; otherwise, you may even prepare for War, and blame your own selves, for that I have denied you Peace.

Hereupon they brake off; and returned each to his own Camp, with no other news than War; bidding their Soldiers prepare for a Battel, wherein should be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning, at break of day they issued into the Field: a notable Match and such as hath very seldom been found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the Battel at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided in to their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not far behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces between the Hastati, that is to the Hastati, they should not come upon the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as they were in File. This he did because of the Elephants; whereas Hannibal had made use of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had made use. For of those Beasts the danger was less, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velines or those of the light stature, that were to begin the Fight, He gave direction, that when they found themselves overcharged, either by the Enemies, (or which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those Lanes that were between the Maniples and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third Battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples which he desired to keep open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing under C. Lelius. In the right wing was Malcanis with his *Nimidian*s. He himself riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; using words not many, but very forcible. He bad them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africk. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the War was at an end; and that their Victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would fly. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own standing Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory; unless they would live like wretched wretched slaves under most merciless Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting Victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourscore, in Front of his Battel. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balcaris, and Moors. Then followed his Battel; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrel than were those Mercenaries; though not so good Soldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a Furlong behind these came his Rearward consisting of those brave Soldiers which had served him in his Italian Wars; and were the only Men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his own right Wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tychicus and the *Nimidian*s he placed in his left Wing against Malcanis. He was indeed far too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodness. For Tychicus and Macedonians had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Malcanis. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be levied in the haste of a few days; and the remainder of those that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his Companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their Saddles. All that he could have done, was to flay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vernina the Son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few days after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay: Hannibal must be fain to comfort himself, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Soldiers; whose virtue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their several conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountiful rewards threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-soldiers, by the many Victories which they had obtained against far greater numbers. He bade them look upon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like to him, as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Carna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the Father of this Man, whom they had hitherto of all compelled to run away. He told them that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them the very worst of the Roman Soldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry Battels could no longer be trusted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the rest, they were young men, the Sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of those weapons, by which their Fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose virtue he meant wholly to repose himself, that they would this day strive to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of Men worthy.

Such exhortations did the two Generals before the Fight. When they drew near together: the Nimidian Horsemen on both sides began to stir first. The Trumpets, and other Instruments of War, sounded to Battel: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kind of help) those that stood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear, and ran upon their own Nimidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Malcanis eysing this, gave charge upon the same *Nimidian*s; and not suffering them to really themselves, drew them made a great spoil of the Roman Velines, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples; but without any harm to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open Divys; according as Scipio had well provided. Divys, according as they received many wounds, and growing therewith furious could no longer be governed: but ran back upon the right point of their own Battel, and beyond that into the open Field. Herewithal they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lelius the same advantage, that Malcanis had against the *Nimidian*s; which he used in like sort. In the mean while the Battels of Foot advanced, and drew near together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a Weapons cast: at what time they gave a shout and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time firmed both in audacity, and in quickness to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while, prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the Battel of the Principes, following somewhat near after the Hastati, encouraged their Fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if need were to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of help or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired Soldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to think themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battel was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat: and yet withal forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to ask them what they meant by this; Fear and Indignation caused those that were at once charged by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own Fellows, to turn their Arms with an heedless fury against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and slain, through their own indifferency, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to overbear this great medley of Enemies, that was made a great slaughter between the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians; which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily fly. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not fire one foot, to help or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his Battel, and save themselves in the open Field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with such thick heaps of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with blood : that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, left the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him : He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hæstati to make a stand there where they were, opposite unto the main battal of the Hannibals. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii : he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hæstati, and made of them his two Corners. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal : who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work, till now, seemed to have been only a matter of patience ; in regard of the sharp Conflict, that was maintained between these notable Soldiers. The Romans were encouraged, by their having prevailed all the day before : They were also far the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh ; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave back one foot ; but rather chose to die upon the ground, whereon he stood. So that after a long time, it was uncertain which part had the worse : unless it may seem, that the Romans were beginning to shrink ; forasmuch as the return of Excerpt. Macanissa and Lælius, from pursuit of the Enem-Polys-Lis-mies Horle, is said to have been most happy, and in a needful time. These upon the sudden charged the Hannibals in Rear ; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to rout.

In this Battel there died of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards : on the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken ; of whom, Sopater, Captain of the Macedonians, was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius ; and was acknowledged, as Livy reports, by Scipio himself. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horle : and being enjoyed, and as he was by the fate of Carthage, to take batel with such disadvantage, he could work no marvels. He saved himself with a few Horle, and flaid not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage ; from which he had been absent six and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, he said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolve to send Embassadors again ; and try the favour of Scipio, whose arms they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica : where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies, and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, he thought it best to make towards Carthage : rather of purpose to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius ; whom he willed to meet him there by Land. Then sending Lælius a way to Rome, with news of the Victory, he set sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by Ten Embassadors from the City : who bearing up with the Admiral Gally, began to use the pitiful gesture of Suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City : and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it ; he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom, in person, he set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the news, that Verrinus, the Son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more Horle than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Verrinus seems to have been both careless of getting intelligence, how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horle, was sent against him : which did not only beat him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few ; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behind him, and twelve hundred taken Prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day ; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horle. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this Victory, though it were not great access unto the former ; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage : whose behaviour, though it was more pitiful than it had been before ; yet procured it less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this War, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the War against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italy : was bold to pass over into the Isle of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal, by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africa, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africa : and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire ; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul, might join with Scipio, were it with no more than equal authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readiness for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him : Winter came on, and he was only tost at Sea with foul weather, first upon the Coast of Trinacria, and afterwards by Sardinia ; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome, of the Victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the War was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus, the new Consul, so passionate, in desiring Africa for his Province, that he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, until he had first his will. Much ado there was about this : and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio ; if the War continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadors. He willed them to consider what they had deserved : and in regard thereof, to think themselves well dealt withal, in that he was contented to leave unto them their Liberty, and their own Laws, with- out out appointing any Governor over them, or Garrison, to hold them in subjection ; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africa, such as they were at the beginning of this War. As touching the rest, he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or Truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto, if they would yield, then required he, That immediately they should deliver up unto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, that they had of theirs : likewise all their Gallies, excepting Ten : and all their Elephants : That they should make no War at all themselves out of Africa, neither yet within Africa, without licence of the Romans : That the Countries, Towns, Goods whatsoever, belonging any wife unto Malanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him : That they should find Corn for the Roman Army, and Wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, until the Peace were fully concluded : That they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the term of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year ; and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would chuse, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With these Conditions the Embassadors returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleasing ; and therefore one Gisco stood up to speak against them, and exhorted the People, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withal what favourable audience was given to this vain Orator, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured ; as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up, and spake unto them : saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the Customs of the City would allow ; forasmuch as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old, until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excused himself of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace ; and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves ; had the demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they resolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio : to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pound weight of Silver, in recompence of Damages, and Injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three months : in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithal he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadors to them sent ; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their Errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen, through their malicious Counsels. Asdrubal, furnished the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadors ; who related unto the Senate, and People, these joyful news. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadors from Philip, King of Macedon : who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the Election of new Consuls, then in hand, was finished ; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate : who first answering unto some Points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved ; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius : who being one of the three Embassadors, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows ; and there leying Men, made War upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreymen, that had lately served Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africa, were kept in bonds by Scipio ; might be released, and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Varus, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured too many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to stay behind, to help them as he might ; which else were like to be brought under the King's subjection. As for Sopater : he affirmed him to be one of the King's Council, and very inward with him, one that served not for Money, but carried Money with him, and four thousand Men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these Points when the Macedonian Embassadors could make unto the Senate no good answer ; they were willed to return, and tell their Master, That War he fought, and War he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points he had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans : first, in that he had wronged their Confederates ; and secondly, in that he had aided their Enemies against them with Men and Money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece, and the Eastern Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their solicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entered into the Senate ; and Asdrubal, above the rest, was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadors to Carthage, upon the like Errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Roman side, saying, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the City, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsell. But if Hanno and himself, might have had their wills ; the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the Peace which they now desired. Herewithal he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour, by which always they had been victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadors : all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified ; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their file. They had patience enough to endure such reproof of Perjury, as they themselves might have laid upon the Romans ; if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what Gods they would swear to keep the Peace hereafter : Asdrubal made answer, Even by the same Gods, Gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus, the Consul, interposing the authority of his Office, would have hindered the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of Peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making War in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rested the Sovereign Command of Rome: and by them referred wholly unto pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates sent unto him from Rome, of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, upon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this favour, the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visit their Countrymen, which were Prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom, and carry home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors, would chuse, should be sent over into Africk, and be freely restored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the Ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in Commis-

At their coming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegados, were delivered up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's, than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their Money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasury could have spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the Pension was annual, and to continue fifty years; it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collecting of the sum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman Yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afrubal Heldus, and told, That it worst of all befel them to laugh, since he had been the cause why all others did weep; he answered, That laughter did not always proceed from joy; but sometimes from extreme indignation. Yet, said he, My laughter is more reasonable, and less absurd, than your tears. For ye should have wept, when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants; and when ye bound your own hands from the use of Arms; without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under; and holds us in assured servitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little Money is wrung out of your private purses, ye have there of some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your misery, for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discoursed Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsel, repented when it was too late; and instead of curing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous Disease, accused that Physician, whose noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the Remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Masaniſſa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations, not undeservedly. To him also he consigned over those Towns of King Syrax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Namidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio, with some part of his Army, took his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no less glorious than his Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entered the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syrax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and died soon after in Prison: or whether he were dead a while before, it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, That it was a barbarous Custom of the Romans, to insult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contemptuously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had always made fair and courteous War. But hereof we shall have better Example, ere the same Age pass. It was neither the person of Syrax, nor any other glory of the Spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous War past, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope, that ever they should see Italy free. This made them look cheerfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio, the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honourable kind of Surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the Title of Countries, where in they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in virtue unto Scipio the African.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip, the Father of Perseus, King of Macedon; His first Acts, and War with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East Countries, and desirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Ætolians overrun Peloponnesus. Philip, and his Associates, make War against the Ætolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

OF the great similitude found in worldly Events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependence upon the will of man, we are left to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threecore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended Conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks, with such numbers of men, as might have seemed irresistible. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War devoted upon that Conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor, with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes, or Cyrus, with his well-trained Army, had made the attempt upon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to employ the travel and virtue of their Men, rather than the greatness of their names, against those people; that were no less valiant, though less renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer, as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea, and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misunderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the Virtue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be sold by any of less noted Excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerdach, had stumbled; Pyrrhus, the Epirot, had dash'd his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entered into War against the Romans. This War he undertook, as it were, for his minds sake: having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended Conquests, of Sicily and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own virtue to be of richer metal, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: then did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. For since the they had overcome the best Warrior in Greece, even King of Greece, could in a Spanish pretended invincible Navy, to what should hinder them from the conquest of those unwelcome Provinces, which in compass of twelve years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their own devotion, by some good means, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation. When therefore the first Punic War was ended, which followed soon after the Wars of Pyrrhus, and of the Tarentines; then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after news in Greece; and to enquire to ascertain any good occasion, that should be on that coast offered. They had also then a strong preparation of very skilful Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So that time it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Tata made at the same time cruel War upon the Greeks: waiting their Country, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter, the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that War which they made with

Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian War. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards increased very hastily, through the indifference of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them being now the Subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his Reign, and his first Actions.

It was like to prove a busy time in the world, when, within the space of four years, new Kings began to Reign in the most of all Countries known; and three of them young Boys, in three of the greatest Kingdoms. This happened from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his Brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolemy Philopator succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his Father Euergetes. And Philip the Son of Demetrius, being sixteen or seventeen years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greeks; by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Dyon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedaemon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Antiarabes then began his Reign in Cappadocia. Lycargus found means to make himself King over the Lacedaemonians, whose Common-weal, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Achaens, a Kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, it was, that open War broke out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemy, and the rest, we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his Reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easy subjection unto Cleomenes: was now become no less obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartans; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Ætolians were no Men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than War. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messinians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Elans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, then it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens were called by the Messinians to help: which they did more willingly; because the Ætolians, passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most ungrate-fully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon these their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay a few days until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the year following. But his anger was greater, ^{Lib. 4. d.} ^{2. b. 5. d.} and he shewed himself a man no fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of an Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a great part of the Country, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achaens; they got hereby only the friendship of the Messinians: with whom, by Licence of King Philip, they made confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians invaded Peloponnesus again; having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulf of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Elans. There joined with them in this their second Invasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no Ships of War unto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Phorbus, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilides, or Scerdiletes, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havoc in the Country now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because Men were desirous to satisfy themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedaemonians: who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meer despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedaemonians had been so affected, and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they flew thick friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appease them of the intended Rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgment: but entreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant always to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: nor for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did misunderstand the Lacedaemonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his Letters unto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could allege any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rebium for that purpose:

purpose: whither if it pleased him to come or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certainty, they adjourned the Council unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law was withstanding, open War was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had delivered it, made election of Sopas to be their Prator; that was Author of these invasions made on Peloponnesus; and the only Man, in a fort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these additions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared busily for the War against the year following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilides, with fair words and promises: whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, so much as the Ætolians had confused him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the War in their own Country, sent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messinians, and Lacedaemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce War unto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needless point; and desired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the War. The Messinians, for whose cause the War was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders; and said, that they durst not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedaemonians; the chief of them studied only how to manage that Treason, for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting till when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to Reign over them again; and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings: but were contented with the rule of Epirots. Of these there were some, that thought the publick safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had prepared them: And hence they referred all their Councils; being perhaps not a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still devising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction on had the more assent, but the contrary side was the more passionate; and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able Man to reform them into their greatness and lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well deserving verne, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Heracles, as in former times; for that without such helps, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonian, and far less by him respected, than were the Achaens. Thus were they transferred, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassy to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himself the Author. Much disputation and hot there was, between those of the Macedonian party and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; until by massacre or banishment of all, or the chief, that speak against the Ætolians, the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedaemonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaens; who had spared the City, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was to be nice, and so regardless of their ancient Laws, as touching the choosing of the one King; that we may justly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Agisippus the Son of Agisippus the Son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to Reign over them, as their apparent to his Grandfather. This Agisippus was a young Boy, standing in need of a Guardian, and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the Son, how young soever, should have his Fathers whole right and title: the Lacedaemonians, though standing in need of a Man, were so punctual in observation of the Law; that they made this Child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of Heirs: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodness of his Claim; but made election of one Lycargus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, bestowed upon each of the Epirots a Talent; and thereby made himself be favoured King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Heracles. This Lycargus, to gratify his Partisans, and to approve his worth by Action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of Peace. There he did great spoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedaemon. After such open hostility, the Lacedaemonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed War against the Achaens.

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwise, than the Achaens and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain answer: the Messinians would not stir: all the burden must lie upon themselves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Elans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedaemonians, could assail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Town of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Acheans; for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sicyon two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Country. But as Ægira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost again, through greediness of spoil; whilst they that should have made it their first care to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the Citadel and other pieces of strength, fell heedlessly to ransack private Houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; wafting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacy. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten that the Enemy grew bolder with time than before. They sent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society. In vain. For the Acheans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his War, they had covetously withheld part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Acheans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to withhold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service, and to convert the Money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians; and that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epirus joynd all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the Seige of a Frontier piece; which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty days, ere he could end the business; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirus. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming; it was thought that he might have made an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon final Towns or Forts: and not seldom, that the impunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their main designs. Thus was our King Henry the eighth led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the Seige of Turnay; at such time as the French King Leaves the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Tervin was lost, and that of his Cavalry wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Brittain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracia, did wonderfully embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to overrun Theffalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, He took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrymen at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon it self. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambracia, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phœtie, Metropolis, Oenide, Pænnium, Eleus, and divers other Towns and Castles; of theis: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes; and wasted all the Country over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achaean Embassadors: news came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a Journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Country; as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismiss the Achaean Embassadors, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So He took his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Phærias with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Dofon, in the Wars of Cleomenes; and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready, at their first request, to take part with Philip's Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army; and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirus: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they required with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruin of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War until another year was laid aside: Philip stole a Journey into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about four hundred Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth, He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arrival. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achaean Soldiers ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Country, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Acheans themselves themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellows, were by him surprised, and all made Prisoners, or slain. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He wan Phlois, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He wan it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a piece of work at such an unreasonable time of the year, was careless of providing even such store of Weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Town was preserved by the King from sack; and given to the Acheans of his own meer motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lefion, which yielded for very fear; hearing how easily he had taken Phlois. This Town also he gave to the Acheans. The like liberality he used towards others; that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to Husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia, where he gave no sacrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captains, and refreshed his Army three days; then he proceeded on to the spoil of those that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoils of their otherwise deserving Neighbours. Great abundance of Cattel he took, with great numbers of Slaves, and much wealth of all sorts; such as could be found in rich Villages. Thence fell he in hand with the Towns, whereto a great multitude of the Country People were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his Journey, by sending Embassadors to yield before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wills, took courage to set themselves at liberty, by seeing the King so near; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betook themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolian Captains; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wan more Towns in the Country, than the sharpness of Winter would suffer him to stay these days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made such haste from him, that he could not overtake them, until they had covered themselves within the Town of Samicum; where they thought to have been safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their Lives and Arms. Having performed so much in this Expedition, the King repofed himself a while in Megalopolis; and then moved to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatened to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with Money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Uliurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himself to have best right unto the Kingdom, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites: and afterwards to confirm himself, by propounding unto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common-wealth. He wan to his party some two hundred Men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori as they were together at Supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his House: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predisposed; they lo little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was using his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he lived afterwards among the Acheans a banished Man, and hated of his own People. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his Fellow-King young Agepolis; whereby he made himself Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort as once he should have been apprehended by the Ephori: But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than to adventure himself into judgment, he chose to flee for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His well known vehemency in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him such good liking among the People, that in his absence they began to consider the weakness of their own furnishes against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He took better heed unto himself: not to amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expel him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chased Agepolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three Uliurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whosoever was towards more private Citizens: as in the War against Philip, He behaved himself as a provident Man, and careful of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: Who afterwards wrought Treason against him, and were justly punished. He invaded the Ætolians a second time: And forced them to sue for Peace: which is granted unto them.

WHilst the King lay at Argos, devising upon his buisness for the year following; some ambitious Men that were about him, studied to diligently their own greatness, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest Men for governing of his youth. The fast Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that understood to make them forlake their alliance with the Ætoliens, and joyn with him upon reasonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, He would Amphidamus to let them understand. That if he would render unto them freely all Prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all foreign invasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Caffle of Tebeo, and made a new invasion upon their Country; then began the Æleens, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætoliens. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and fend him Prisoner into Aratus: But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was fabled) marveling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Æleens, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus; Apelles, his Counsellor, thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his Son together, had hid devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: and long of them he said it was, that the Æleens did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (that Father and the Son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Æleens once became at the devotion of the Macedonians; and this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very forward to this match, nor the Æleens in hearkning to the Kings offer, was a false counsel; he; deviled by Apelles himself, upon a false ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage sent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearse it over again to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you fuch ungrateful wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Acheans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; that whenever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his own or a man of worth; He should forbear a while to give credit, until he had diligently examined the bufines. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himself Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few days: wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him about the King. He was not forgetful, to examine him there the conspiracy of the Arati: which when he found better than a meer device against his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unrelentful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to pass; began (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himself to his cunning again; and as before being cheekt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he hath prepared a snare for the Arati; so failing of them he thinks it wisdom to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought he had taken the Swallow which drave away from out of the Chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Air by the Bird that was too strong to be caught and held by the feibill workmanship of Cob-webe. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Anigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander, Captain of the Guard, were faithful men and such as would not be corrupted. The other two Leontius Captain of the Targueries, and Megalæus, chief of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put fomes Creatures of his own into their rooms. Against Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumination and privy detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more finenes; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of War; and one, whom for his many virtues the King might ill spare from being always in his presence. By such art he thought to have removed him as we say, Out of Gods Blessing into warm Sun. In the mean season Aratus retired himself; and fought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prator of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King. He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the Money and the Corn, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Achaens. This made the King understand his own error; which he wisely sought to reform betimes. He perswaded the Achaens to rejoin their Parliament from Aegium, to Sicyon the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his Son: perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, of whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of these worthy men, he easily obtained what he would of the Achaens. First, talents they gave him out of hand, with greater of Corn; and further decreed, that for loss of him as he himself in person followed the Wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten Talents a Month. Being thus enabled he began to provide shipping that to he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime People, to his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see thee go forward to well without his help; even the ministry of those whom he most hated.
Wherefore he entred into conspiracy with Antiochus and Megaleas: binding himself and them by oath, to crols and bring to nought, well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing they thought to bring le to say, that very want of ability to do any thing without them, should make him speak them fair; and be glad to furnish himself in their directions. The King it is like had frod in some awe of them whilst he was a Child; and therefore these wife men perfwaded themselves, that, by looking big upon him, and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a Child still. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked oath, than of their duty.

His Fleets Army being in a readiness: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his Forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would have fallen, as soon after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achaens, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himself with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephalonia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he besieged the Town of Palæa, that had been very servicable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates: and might bevery useful to him, if he could get it. While he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen Ships of War from Sceardalide; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acer-nanians, and Messinians. But the Town was ob-finate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the Wall, where he threw there hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his Covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyle, and many slain; not of the worst Souldiers, but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this: but there was no remedy; and therefore he thought upon breaking up the siege. For it was easier unto the Townsmen to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. While he stood thus perplexed, and uncertain what course to take: the Messinians and Acer-nanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Country. The Messinians al-liged, that Lycurus was busy in wafting their Country: upon whom the King might come un-awares in one day; the Erelian Winds which then blew, serving tidly for his Navigation. Hereo also Leontius perwaded; who considered that those Winds, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they drain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-days) and make him spend the Summer to small purpose. But Aratus gave better counsel, and prevailed. He flewed how unfitting it were, to let the Ætolians over-run all Thessaly again, and some part of Macedon, while the King withdrew his Army far off to seek small adventures. Rather he said, that the time now served well to carry the War into Ætolia; since the Prætor was gone hence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lycurus, he was not fitrong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achaens were appointed to make head against him. Ac-

According to this advice, the King sets sail for Ætolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Ætoliens from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and joyed with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon the bad neighbours. He marched up into the inland Country; and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; he passed on to Thermum; which was the Receiptplace of the Ætoliens; and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fertility, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow, steep, and difficult ascent. There did the Ætoliens use to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their Election of Magistrates, and their solemn Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the natural strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoil: whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompensed. So he loaded his Army: and confining all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætoliens; in remembrance of the like their courtesy, shewed upon the Temples of Dion and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionless) more for the Kings Honour have been forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Antiochus da Gange the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida. That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætoliens laid for him: which that they would do he believed before; and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell upon his skirts: but he had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backs of the Ætoliens, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the Enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Ætoliens made countenance of fight, issuing out of Siratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious Expedition being every way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great Feast unto all his Friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his Fellow Megalas. They came, because they could not chuse: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. Grieved then to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings business; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. The sorrow and indignation, which they could ill dispense in their Faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drink, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uproar; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King tending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megalas, and another with him, came

The King began to rate them for their disorder; and they, to give him froward answers: insumch as they said at length, that they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targetiers at his heels; and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megalas, yea, and to cast him into Prison? Why, said the King, It was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both fild and angry; seeing himself out-trownd, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megalas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hindrance of the Kings Victory at Palesa, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no less touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megalas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak: that he, and Crimen one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crimen being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megalas. This was done upon the way homeward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of business this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well they could; with ill success: yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harm as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedæmon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the Fields: and having beaten the Enemy in some skirmishes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of Cattel, Slaves, and other Country-spoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætoliens. They had gracious audience: and he would them to deal first with the Ætoliens; who, if they would make the same request, should not find him unreasonable. The Ætoliens had sped ill that year: neither saw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean season they had been grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their own Country. All Greece and Macedon was up in Arms against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out; since they were not strong enough to keep the Field, but had already suffered those miseries of War, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætoliens readily entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty days with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should be held at Rhium; whether if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst

Whilst these things were in hand; Leontius and Megalas thought to have terrified the King by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device proved to no good effect. The Souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors; without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea, the Souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew, as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalas were fore afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self, to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their Treason; requesting him speedily to repair to Corinth, where he might find between them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the business, undertaken by him and his treacherous Companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves unto him; and received from him their dispatch in every business. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occasion to magnify the virtue of Apelles; making slight mention (only for fashion sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his especial care, that Money, and all things needful for the publick service, should be wanting. Yea, he enforced the King, for very need, to sell his own Plate, and household vessels: thinking to resolve these, and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereof if the King would give assent, then taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the City of Corinth, where Philip then lay; he was met with in great Pomp and Royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falldown. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time; for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was not a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his Attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him, save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megalas to look unto himself, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion, his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targetiers, as it were to do some piece of service; but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a Messenger presently to his Targetiers, to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf.

They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the Debt of Megalas, if that were all the matter, they said, that they were ready to make a Purse for his discharge. This affection of the Souldiers, made Philip more hasty than else he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere Letters of Megalas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætoliens; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King underflood more perfectly the falldown, not only of Megalas, but of Apelles: whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him so poor. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalas, that was fled to Thess. As for Apelles, he committed both him, and his Son, and another that was inward with him, to Prison: wherein all of them shortly ended the lives. Megalas also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to fly, was weary of his own life, and flew himself about the same time.

The Ætoliens, as they had begun this War upon hope of accomplishing what they lifted in the Nonage of Philip: In finding that the vigor of this young Prince, repented with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very defructious to make an end of it. Nevertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by the Kings Targetiers; they began to hope a-new, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this ungovernable Nation; He thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning, and continuing the War, should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their own Country. In his return homeward, he called into judgment one Prionius, a Companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians, and suffered Death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his Imprisonment: yet now they think the man worthy to die, that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip was some bordering Towns; from which the Dardaniens, Ætoliens, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make Roads into his Kingdom. When he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Ætoliens might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Prionius King of Ægypt, and from the City of Byzantium, re-continuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This falshood had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of War, but presently there were found Intercissors, who plying the passion of Greekish blood, blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly Offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to bind unto them those people, that were, howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers. But hereby it came to pass, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætoliens, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in fear to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer to the Embassadors as he had done the former year: That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: but that the Ætoliens, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withal, to signify plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by Letters out of Macedon, what a notable Victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battel at Teraymene. These Letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal; and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætoliens: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus, an Ætolian, make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves: without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly serving, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy. Such advice could the Ætoliens then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatening them at hand:

but being soon after weary of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece; whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for Damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenor of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THIS being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the business of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battel of Cannæ: after which he joyned in League with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsel, to take part with their Enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hero, a far weaker Prince, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsel which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætoliens did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon Conditions that might easily be broken: have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenor of the League between Him and Carthage: which may seem not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it self then used; though it had been over-long to have been inserted into a more busie piece.

THE OATH AND COVENANTS

HANNIBAL, General of the CARTHAGINIANS,

AND

XENOPHANES, Embassador of PHILIP, King of MACEDON.

THIS is the League ratified by Oath, which HANNIBAL, the General, and with him MAGO, MYRCAL, and BARMOCAL, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with XENOPHANES, the Son of CLEOMACHUS, Athenian, whom King PHILIP, the Son of DEMETRIUS, hath sent unto us, for himself, and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo: before † The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules, and Iolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth; before Rivers, and Meadows, and Waters; before all the Gods that have power over Carthage; before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. HANNIBAL, the General hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us. That this Oath stand for Friendship and loving Affection, That We become Friends, familiar, and Brethren, upon Covenant, That the safety of the Lords, the Carthaginians, and of HANNIBAL, the General, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Laws, and of the Ulicans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Towns and Nations with which We hold Friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom We shall hold Friendship, or make Alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserved by King PHILIP, and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like manner shall King PHILIP, and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Associates, be saved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Africans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Soldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter join with us in Italy. We shall not take counsel one against the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readiness and good Will, without deceit or subtilty, We shall be Enemies unto the Enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which we have already League and Friendship. We also shall be Enemies to the Enemies of King PHILIP, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already League and Friendship. The War that We have with the Romans, have Ye also with them, until the Gods shall give us a new and happy end. Ye shall aid Us with those things whereof We have need, and shall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Us their help in this War against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer Friendship, We shall make Friendship in such wise, that Ye shall be partakers of the same Friendship, with Condition: That they shall not have power to make War upon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over the Corycraans, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render unto DEMETRIUS PHARIUS all those that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such Peace made) shall make War upon Ye or Us; We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities and States, with whom We hold already League and Friendship. To this League if We or Ye shall think fit to add or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IV.

§. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural Vices, being therein seduced by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick War. He joins with Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

HERETO Philip had carried himself as a virtuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his Wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick War, proceeded from a Royal greatness of mind, with a desire to secure and increase his own Estate, adding therewithal Reputation to his Country. But in this business he was guided (as hath been said) by DEMETRIUS PHARIUS: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him, even as he listed. For the Virtues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustful, bloody, and tyrannical: desirous of power to do what he ought, than so far forth, as by making a fair show he might breed in men such a good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should abuse himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks, that were his Associates, under a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at better times. DEMETRIUS PHARIUS could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coachman, with the Reins in his hand, those affections which himself did only seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted ARATUS: which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a foreign War) unto domestic objects: than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In process of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found ARATUS busied among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governors, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws, to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble. Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be oppressed by a few: as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrans. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the King's assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governors therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the Multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion the People took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easy to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs, their guardians, were slain. But his falsehood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger ARATUS forbear, to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgraceful words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old ARATUS aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do Sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use; for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilst he was thereto sacrificing, and had the Enralls of the Beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to ARATUS, and gently asked him, whether the Tokens that he saw therein did signify, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have schooled him a little; were it only for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his Son. But as ARATUS stood doubtful what to answer, DEMETRIUS PHARIUS gave this Verdict: If thou be a Souldier, thou must go thy way, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Ox by both his Horns. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Accorinthus, unto the Two Horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the Opinion of ARATUS: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his Faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by ANIGOMUS, which was his credit, then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his Friends become his Enemies.

To this good advice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing between him and the ARATS; whom he thought more froward than befemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For as he likewise discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in referring to his house, he had been dishonest with his Son's Wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his own Countreyman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That unonself counsels are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirotes were his followers and dependents; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remain, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he seized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid Siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings; but thinking himself strong enough to do what he listed, and not fearing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus instead of influencing the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required; he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius, the Roman, came into those parts; who not only maintained the Epirotes against him, but procured the Ætoliens to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrences whereof we have related before, in place where it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the Office of a good Captain: yet when leisure served, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Country, with hope to deceive them, as before. They undertook him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too far. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, he went to work by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to help him in such an Enterprize. In this attempt upon Messene he lost Demetrius Phorius; that was his Counsellor, and Flatterer, not his perverter; as appears by his growing daily more nought in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he vexed against those, that seemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poisoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, he poisoned also the younger Aratus; hoping that these things would never have been known, because they were done secretly, and the poisons themselves were more sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Processions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Priest ordained unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Heros, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the Gods. Hereunto they are said to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo, which is like enough to have been true; since the help of the Devil is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The loving Memory of Aratus, their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but work in the Achaens a marvellous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsel for themselves. At the present, the Murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in case to suspect, without his help that had committed it. The Ætoliens were a most outrageous people, great darrers, and shameless robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soon divulged, especially that main point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Ætoliens should have the Country and Towns; but the Romans the Spoil, and carry away the people, to sell for Slaves. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make freight alliance with the Ætoliens, as knowing their unenvil disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations, except their own) to make havock of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedæmians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Ætoliens; whose friendship they had embraced in the late War. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaens, his Confederates, sufficed to retain them: especially at such time as their own necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himself the Dymeans, by an ineffable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætoliens, and redeeming their people wheresoever they might be found, that had been carried away Captive, and sold abroad for Slaves. Thus might he have blotched out the memory of offences past; if the malignity of his natural condition had not otherwise broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodness. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not ashamed, he took Polyxenus, the Wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the second time: for of that which happened in this their first Invasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen, General of the Achaens: and Machinidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A Battle between them, wherein Machinidas is slain.

It happens often, that the decay of one eminent man discovers the Vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood up Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careless of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their Neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and having no command, did especial service to Antigonus, at the battle of Sellasia, against Cleomenes. Thence forward until now, he had spent the most part of his time in the Isle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or never at peace between themselves; he bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himself so strictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy, to have his followers well mounted and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them in all exercise of service, that he made the Achaens very strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or General of the Nation, he had no less care to reform their Military Discipline throughout, whereby his Country might be strong enough to defend it self, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perswaded the Achaens to cut off their vain expence of bravery, in apparel, householdstuff, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant; by so much were they like to prove the better Soldiers; and furbur in behaviour unto the pride of their furniture. They had served hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off: that were useful in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hasty Expeditions; whereat Aratus had been most accustomed. But when they came to handy strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arm themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of Shield, with good Swords, and strong Pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the form of their embattailing; not making the Files so deep as had been accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might use the service of many hands.

Eight Months were spent of that year, in which he first was Prætor of the Achaens; when Machinidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, caused him to make trial, how his Soldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machinidas was the Successor unto Lyorgus; a man more violent than his foregoer. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta; but to hold the City in obedience to himself perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achaens, that were favourers of liberty; but to strengthen himself by friendship of the Ætoliens: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all, or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwillingly. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recovering the Mastery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machinidas to be idle; but made him always ready to fall upon his Neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him fail of his Attempts. At the present he was stronger in Men, than were the Achaens; and thought his own Men better Soldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied elsewhere, he entered the Country of the Mantineans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done before him; yea, and perhaps to get the Laconians of Peloponnesus, as having stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantineia; where was fought between them a great battle. The Tyrant had brought into the Field upon Carts, a great many of Engines; whereby to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen lent forth his light Armour a good way before him; so as Machinidas was fain to do this like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens, and of Machinidas, were drawn up to the fight: being far advanced each before their own Palans, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoiled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machinidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing Execution, in most of the battles fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired Soldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by Free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppressed by Tyranny, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficial to themselves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to assure their own servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have good cause to maintain his quarrel as their own; whereas they that serve under a free State, have no other motive to do manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victory; many Companies (if not all) of foreign Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows, will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The Stipendiaries therefore of the Achaens, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machinidas, that shortly they betook themselves to flight; and could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battle of the Achaens. This disaster had been sufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanor of Machinidas, and found in him that Error which might reform the Victory. The Tyrant, with his Mercenaries, gave chase unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battle his Lacedæmians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Achaens; that were already disheartened by the flight of their Companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of sight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedæmians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better Soldiers than the Achaens; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battle; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achaens, who drove them headlong into the Ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopemen getting over the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopemen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machinidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chase: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a Bridge that was over the Ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lusty Troop of Horse about him he made towards the Bridge: hoping to find the Achaens in disorder, and to set upon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopemen ready to make good the Bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his Company, rode along the Ditch-side; and searched for an easy passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopemen therefore leaving the charge of the Bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the Ditch itself, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battle of the Lacedaemonians side about four thousand: and more than four thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaen Mercenaries, probable it is that the loss was not greatly cared for, since that War was at an end, and for their Money they might hire more when they should have need.

Philip having Peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamum, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Limages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achaens learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline, and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of War inferior to any, that should have brought against them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonians, He made no great use of them: But when he had once concluded Peace with the Romans and Atolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Cartaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together, or very nearly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achaens would have done him service; they must, by helping him to oppress others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamum, who had joyined with the Romans and Atolians in War against him.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers virtue. His fortune began in Philetarus his Uncle: who being gelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a Child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great Men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuchs, whose affections could not be obliged unto Wives or Children. He was entertained into the Family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betook himself to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his Money and accomps. But when at length he stood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Town of Pergamum, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Town and Money, together with his own service, He offered unto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus Battle. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus having slain Lysimachus, died shortly after himself, before he made use of Philetarus or his Money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamum with the Country about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had two Brethren: of which the elder is said to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdom to the elder of these, or to the Son of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the dissension, between Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the Sons of the second Antiochus. He fought a Battle with Hierax, near unto Sardis; and won the victory. At which time, to animate his Men against the Gauls that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word Victorie upon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off; and when the hot Liver of the beast that was sacrificed, had clearly taken the print of the Letters, He published this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foretelling that the gods would be assistant in that Battle.

After this victory, he grew a dreadful Enemy to Seleucus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a surfeit of over-much drink; and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was Son unto Attalus the youngest Brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no less valiant. By his own proper efforts He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocians into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achaens: who setting up himself, as King against Antiochus the great, Reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamum; but by help of the Trojan age, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselves, without invitation, and found themselves work in quarrels of their own making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his War against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they nevertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great cruelty, sparing neither age nor sex. But the swarm of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellepontus: where, in feasting themselves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheless, presuming afterwards upon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharp exaction whereof, they

they had no more respect unto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them; and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themselves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their Neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the Posterity of such as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the foolish reign of the Perfians; or in the busy times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their Line had married with Astolus, Sister unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the Son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, elysing his time while the Macedonians were at Civil Wars among themselves; recovered his Dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Perfian Empire; and are said to have issued from the Royal House of Achaemens. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Phylomachus, a King that assisted Primus at the War of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were always conformable unto the fit of itself. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reign in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the Great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the less molested. Calpurnius, one of Alexander Captains, made an Expedition into their Country; where he was vanquished. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they stultified, as did the rest, until the reign of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamum, and by the Rhodians.

P Prusias as a Neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himself, by taking to Wife the Daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacy with the Atolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Atolian War, and was devising with Antiochus about sharing between them two, the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolemy Philopater a friend unto them both was newly dead, and had left his Son Tol Epiphanes a young Child his Heir; the Bithynian entreated this his Father in Law to come over into Asia, there to win the Town of the Ciams, and bestow it upon him. Prusias had no right unto the Town, nor just matter of quarrel against it: but it was fitly desired for him; and therewithal rich. Philip came; as one that could not well deny to help his Son in Law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst he lay at the Siege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprize. He gave dilatory; but otherwise gentle answers: making them as if he would condescend to their request; when he intended nothing less.

At length he got the Town: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed to regardful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendered himself odious to his Neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poor Ciams; and were advertised by Embassadors of purpose sent unto them from Philip, That, howsoever it were in his power to win the Town as soon as he lifted: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, He was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency the Embassadors said, that he would manifest unto the World, what slanderous Tongues they were; which noised a broad false reports, as went of his falsehood and oppressions. Whilst the Embassadors were declaring at Rhodes in the Theatre to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had lacked and destroyed the Town of Cas, and made slaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians took this in great disdain, no less were the Atolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcidum (which he had withdrawn from them: Confederacy to his own) what little trust was to be reposed in the Faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moved with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchasing with much liberality, the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens virtue, having lost their own. On the friendship of the Atolians he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late War with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, He easily drew into a freight alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his Friends, but most of all in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open War. It had been unseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to lessen upon Asia was manifest, and his falsehood no less manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not far from Cios, and fought with him a Battle at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly escaping to Land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the Battle took Harbour under a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks upon the shore: Yet inasmuch as he had suffered far greater loss of Ships and Men, than had the Atolians; and since he durst not in few days after put to sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to Sea, him in his Port; the honour of the Victory was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards engaged and won some Towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to delight his opponents; or whether upon any hopeful desire of conquest, it is uncertain. The hopeful desire of conquest, it is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Mine: and finding the Earth so stony, that it resisted his work: He nevertheless commanded the Pyoniers to make a noise under ground; and secretly in the night-time he raised great Mounds about the entrance of the Mine, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went marvelously forward. At length he sent word to the Townsmen, that by his under-mining, two Acres of their Wall stood only upon wooden Props: to which if he gave fire, and entered by a breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prætorian little thought, that he had sowed all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise up those heaps which they saw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the Mine. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-fac'd, and gave up the Town as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himself in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodiens were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, seek master of quarrel against Philip. The Athenians, upon slight cause proclaim War against Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns: and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Ambassador. The furious resolution of the Aboydien.

These Asiatick matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet served well to make a noise in Rome; and fill the Peoples heads, if not with a desire of making War in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient for to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were fædious and seldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonians, though length of time and continual dealings in Greece ever since the Reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals; yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally footstool a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels; and they that had been most beholden unto him, were nevertheless weary of him, by reason of his personal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies; especially since the divisions of the Country were such, that every petty Estate was apt to take counsel apart for itself; without much regarding the generality. But the poor commonality of Rome, had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous War with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick all their Money: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive until fifteen or sixteen years after this, their whole sum back again. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present Money, but much of it in Lapid: it befell them to rest a while; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the less able to bestow. Wherefore they took no pleasure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodiens had sent Embassadors to solicit them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia; or that At. Lædus, their Agent in Greece, had sent Letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous Enemy, that solicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold War with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, especially with the help of the Ætoliens their good Friends, and (in a manner) his own professed Enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if only to predispose men unto the War, and give it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affairs of those, that were more mighty than himself. He was too unskilful, or otherwise too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new Enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his help to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have straitened his forces to the utmost in making War upon them; or, in desisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of Peace which is of all other the most natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unless they think themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of Peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby such Articles of Peace can be held inviolable, save only * by the water of Syris, that is by Necessity: which whilst it binds one party, or both unto performance, making it appear that he shall be a loser who flatters from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long only) be presumed that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never harkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had Peace with Carthage, then was this River of Syris dried up: and then could his swear, as * Mercury did in the Comedy, * Plat. Amph. that they own selves, even by their good swords, that they had good reason to make War upon him. The Voyage of Scopas into Africa, and the present War against Attalus; were matter of quarrel as much as needed or if; this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took state upon them nevertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entering into the Temple of Ceres, in the days of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous Superstition, vainly said to be available unto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer Error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet as it had been for some heinous Crime, they were put to death. All their Countreymen at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publick injury, by War upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonian to help them, they entered into Asia: who waited it with Fire and Sword; and carried thence away with them a great booty. This indignity stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more than they had ability to perform. All which at the present they could do, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happy success against Philip, and entreating him to visit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he understood, that the Roman Embassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodiens. Landing in the Prætorian, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoicing that he continued Enemy to Philip; and he being no less glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the War. The Athenians came forth of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their Wives and Children, in as solemn a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in every loving manner: but towards Attalus himself, they omitted no point of observance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius, the youngest of them, should step aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydos; which else he was like to carry. Æmilius, coming to Philip, tells him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodiens, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydos, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependancy upon Attalus. Here to Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodiens had made War upon him: and that he did only require them with the like. Do you also (said Æmilius) require these poor Abydians with such terrible War, for any like invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he rudely made answer to Æmilius; It is your Youth, Sir, and your Beauty; and (above all) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: if ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Ambassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful Oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governors and Ancients of the City, to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out that he was fain to stay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obdurate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodiens, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodiens sent thither only one Quadrireme Gally: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondered much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much upon themselves.

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent unto Prilemy Epiphones, King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that War; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Ægyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his Reign, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtesy for which the Romans were to thank him, was, That out of Egypt they had lately been supplied with Corn, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This Mislage could not but be welcome to the Ægyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Council for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corn: since this their Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Estate no less than theirs.

But as the Errand was for the most part complementary: so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius, the youngest of them, should step aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydos; which else he was like to carry. Æmilius, coming to Philip, tells him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodiens, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydos, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependancy upon Attalus. Here to Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodiens had made War upon him: and that he did only require them with the like. Do you also (said Æmilius) require these poor Abydians with such terrible War, for any like invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he rudely made answer to Æmilius; It is your Youth, Sir, and your Beauty; and (above all) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: if ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Ambassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful Oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governors and Ancients of the City, to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busy, the Memory of their Oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their Women, Children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Athyenians three days leisure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the Town; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fools.

The Romans decree War against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time, both in quality and estate.

THIS calamity of the Athyenians, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearly resembled; though Rome was not a-like interested in the quarrel. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Athens: which if the Macedonian should win, then rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embark himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five months, but in the short space of five days sailing. Thus P. Scipio, the Consul, told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The Example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged, to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africa; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By such Arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in readiness, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, for their constancy (as was said) in not changing their Faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them; though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves, that any Greek Town, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts; had reason to give thanks unto those that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, that Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busy-headed Athyenians, who falling out with the Acanians, and consequently with Philip, about a matter of Megaram, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus, and other their Neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Scipio, the Consul, were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but took the ready way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Ajpas, between Dyrachium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his help; whereof they could make no benefit whilst he was so far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and entreated him to deliver them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius, with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater design. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rovers from Chalcis, in the Isle of Euboea; and some bands of adventurers out of Corinth; used to take their Ships, and spoil their fields, because they had declared themselves against Philip, that was Lord of these two Towns. The Robberies done by these Pirates, and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preferred them. As for the Athenians themselves; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to undertake the Conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Sicily: to make war upon the great Perjan King; and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest: had now no more than three Ships, and those open ones, not much better than long Boats. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their own.

The Town of Chalcis, in Euboea, taken and sacked by the Romans, and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempts to take Athens by Surprise: waileth the Country about: and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, and his Wife. Philip offers to make War against Nabis for the Achaeans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again: and provides against his Enemies. Some Exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes join with them. Great labouring to draw the Aetolians into the War.

Philip, returning home from Athyens, heard the news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment; or perhaps before he had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and try what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: He received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius, with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own employment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scare-Crow, to scare the Athenians grounds from spoil; and therefore gladly took in hand a business of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who repose themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night, for fear of being detected; and, arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it (unless he should have left the heartless Athenians to their own defence,) he set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all provisions for War, which were plentifully filled. Neither were he and his associates contented with the great abundance of Spoil which they carried aboard their Ships; and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but to their delight and harred unto the King, they overthrew, and brake in pieces the Statues unto him there erected. This done, they hastened away towards Athens: where the news of their Exploit were like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about some twenty miles thence: whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, back at work in ransacking the Town, and loading themselves with spoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed Foot he had with him, and three hundred Horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not impossible to take his Enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post, that stood Scour for the City upon the borders, had not deserted him a far off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was midnight when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearless of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadel to sound the Alarm, and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signs of busy preparation usual in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the Walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by Sea, and had no cause of haste,) yet having in the Town some Mercenary Souldiers, which they kept, of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to issue forth at a Gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his Example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his Valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drove them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his Courage transported him further, than discretion would have allowed, even to the very Gate. But he retired without harm taken; for that they which were upon the Towers over the Gate, could not use their casting Weapons against him, without endangering their own people, that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of Exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, near adjoining unto Athens: of which he spared none, but sullered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the Sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Aegina; too late, in regard of what was already past; but in good time, to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achaean held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achaean were devising upon War, which they intended to make against Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedaemon: who being started up in the room of Machonidas, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his Mercenaries; and of his Subjects had no regard. He was a cruel Oppressor; a greedy Extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one, that in his natural condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his Wife Apgea, was very fitly matched with him: since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the Men, than hers in fleecing their Wives; whom the would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had taken the Athenians, with all their Treasures and Apparel. Livius. Her Husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly Garments as he used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetoric. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose Money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apgea stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with Excuses; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apgea (who sat by in a Chair) could persuade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up, and opened the Arms, as it were for embracement. Those Arms were full of sharp Iron Nails, the like whereof were all sticking in the Breasts, though hidden with her Cloaths: and herewith she gripped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Aetolians, as Machonidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopamens Vertue he stood in fear; and therefore durst not provoke the Achaean, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cyclades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved Occupation of War: then did Nabis fall upon their Territory: and wasting all the Fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Towns.

Against this Tyrant, the Achaean were preparing for War, when Philip came among them; and had set down, what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this business; forasmuch much as he alone would ease them of this War, and take the burden upon himself. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whilst he was upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns ungarded. In which respect, he thought they would be pleased, to send a few Men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Isle of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the War against Nabæ. Immediately they found out his device: which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War against Nabæ; he brake up the Assembly, with every mans good liking: whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Nevertheless he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philotes, one of his Captains, that with two thousand men, had been doing what harm he might unto the Country. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyræus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plenty, of their own; or, having long ago been Matters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he only pull all down: but caused his Men to break the very Stones, that they might be unserviceable to the reparation. His loss at Cbalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad Neighbours, which were likely to inflict him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassy; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius, the Roman Consul, encamped upon the River of Asius. Thence he sent forth Aspilius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Aspilius took sundry Castles and Towns; using such extremity of Sword and Fire at Antipatria, the first good Town which he wan by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, unless they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his Spoil, he was charged in Rear, upon the passage of a Brook, by Athenagoras, a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these Enemies, took Prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their Camp. The success of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet served to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Plauratus, the Son of Scordiloides, the Illyrian; Aminander, King of the Atthamanians; and Bato, the Son of Lengarus, a Prince of the Dardanians.

They offered their assistance unto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make use of Plauratus, and Bato, when he entered into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay between the Ætolians and Thessaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to stir them up against Philip.

So the present care, was wholly set upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Roman, and Atthamanian. Of which, the Macedonian spake first: and said, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of Peace between his Master and the Ætolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause; to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their War in Greece tended only to defence of the Ætolians: and yet notwithstanding, had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making Peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busy, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messina, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleged many Examples; adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who, if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to consult about War and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom, if at any time, upon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the Peace which still continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who fought to break it now.

It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good Answer to these Objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereof this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Ætolians were set on by them to speak next: who had store of Eloquence, and matter of Re-creation enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Ambassador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few days past, made War upon the Gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pitiful rehearsal of their own Calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feel the same that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens it self, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the Gods, were like to have felt; if the Walls and the Roman Arms had not defended them.

Then

Then speak the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their own oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made War in the Ætolians behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made Peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being bused with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them and convenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and Victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired: were themselves carried unto the War by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to help those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymeachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off awhile with a dilatory answer: though he told his Countermen, That by referring themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in general terms: That overmuch haste was an Enemy to good Council: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, he passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the State, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawful to treat of such affairs, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to hear, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His Son Perseus, a very Boy, was sent to keep the straits of Pelagena against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Council, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may seem, that the presence of the Kings Son, how young soever, would both encourage his followers, and terrify the Enemies; by making them at least believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his Father; whom earnest business called thence another way. No danger of Enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodiens and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his Journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Dafareti, a People in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Thracia, about the Mountains of Canda

via; that running along from Hemus in the North until they join in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three days they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of Battle. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Camp into the open Field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his Horse, to entertain them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazard all at it upon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his own forces: yet being no less unwilling to lose too much in reputation; he made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targeteers: and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targeteers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush; having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him so hotly, that they drove him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targeteers, not staying to let them run into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the work, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a Battle: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourscore years ere this, that Pyrrius carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seen any of those Beasts before. But now the same Romans, (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrius) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying to near the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his Men to fetch in Corn out of the Fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Foragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: even till their presumption, and his own supposed fear, should make them careless. When this was come to pass, he took all his Horse and light-armed Foot, with which he occupied a place in the midway, between the Foragers and their Camp. There he stayed in Cover with part of his forces; to keep the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Country, to fall upon the stragglers: willing them to put all to the Sword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scour the Fields, lighted all or most of them upon the King and his Companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his Horse, and bids them help their fellows where they saw it needful: He himself with the Legions followed. The Companies of Horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvassing the Field, took their task where they found it. But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himself. They had the disadvantage: as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellows also might have been, if the King had well bestowed himself, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedily about a poor gleaming: the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their Horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safety. They ran which way they could: and (as Men that lie in wait for others, are seldom heedful of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marshes and Bogs, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings Horse was slain under him: and there had been cast away, if a loving Subject of his had not alighted: mounted him upon his own Horse; and delivered him out of peril, at the expense of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashness; and the Consul, with as much dulness; for this days service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these Enemies without any blow: since when all the Fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other side it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Camp, at such time as he fled thither half amazed with fear of being either slain or taken; they might have won it. But that noble Historian Livy, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Camp; and could not be so astonished with the loss of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himself; He was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streighs. This was it which made him adventure to do somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the tooner, and afterwards look unto his troublesome Neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to clear himself of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for burial of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night; and left fires in his Camp to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down Trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square Battel of Pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their Arrows were of small force against the Roman Shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of Stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand; partly yielded for fear. But the spoil of these, and of the Fields adjoining, was not sufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themselves apace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilst he himself went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had referred himself and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen upon Macedon; grew no less buse on the sudden, than before he had been wise. He persuaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim War, joined his forces with Aminander the Zibemianian; and made invasion upon Thessaly. They took and cruelly sacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they listed. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to have taken their Camp; if Aminander, more wary than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewise the Town of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given to the Romans; and the People for Slaves. Other attempts on that side were hindered: either by foul weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

§. XII.

Vilius the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Malanilla, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

THIS the time ran away: and P. Vilius, a new Consul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutiny of his oldest Soldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their own estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Canna: as may seem by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy; whither fain they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Vilius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the History of his day is lost: whereof the mis is not great; since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Livy, hath adorned this Vilius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livy himself, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Author; we may reasonably believe, that Vilius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and strong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Adrubal, had been able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved her self, taking warning by her Neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that had staid behind Adrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captain of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians; giving them to understand, That, if they were not weary of the Peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up this their Citizen Amilcar; who made War in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seem otherwise to have favoured a little of some fear) That of the Fugitive Slaves belonging unto the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this Errand, had further charge to treat with Malanilla, as also with Vermina the Son of Syphax. Unto Malanilla, besides matter of complement, they were to signify what pleasure He might do them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their War against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readiness in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and fild, That having been, and being still (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire Peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they used not to confer upon any, save only upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make Peace with him, was wholly committed unto these Embassadors upon such terms as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives, they had restored as many as they could find; and would in that point; the Senate. Herewithal they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Malanilla would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse; but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadors, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdom; and, without any disputation, agreed with them upon terms of Peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls, they laid Siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a Battel with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this Battel: and the fruit of the Victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the work easy to those, that afterwards should have the manning of War among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to think upon the business of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellor whom they hated; as also to assure unto himself the Acheans, by rendering unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not only by exercising and traying his People, but by fortifying the passages that led thenceunto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Vilius, having unprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a Journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with Victuals, determined at length to try a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province, whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

§. XIII.

The Romans began to make War by negotiation. T. Quintius sends a passage against Philip. Thessaly wrested by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. A treaty of Peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give Battel to the Enemy, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they belighted his Towns: and so forced him to try the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborn it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakness. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the fable

Greeks

Greeks the Art of Negotiation; wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and flood indeed, * many years after this, unto private men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punic War. This had been the Commonalty averfe from the Macedonian War, and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the Enterprife, to make ufe of their cunning. Yet being weary of the flow pace wherewith their bufiness went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the lefs need to rely upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand foot and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius the new Consul into Macedon. Their Navy, and other means could well have served for the setting forth, and transportation of a greater Army; but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many, and too far from home) have bred some Jealousie in their Friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some Friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their Enemies more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the Forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom against Antiochus who invaded it; or else that they would not take it unaccountedly, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which more concerned him. Their Answer was remarkable: They said, that it was not their manner to use the aid of their Friends longer than their Friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it: That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, though he were their good Friend; against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but that they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common Friends unto both of the Kings) do their best to persuade an accomodation between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves towards their good Friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally, at their entreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of Friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear.

T. Quintius having away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Affrick. He found Vilius the old Consul, (whom at his coming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Asius or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seek their way into Macedon through the poor Country of the Dassaretians; or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together mispent their time, and been forced to return back without profit for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly; then should they enter into a plentiful Country; and which, by long dependance upon the Macedonians, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheless the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Asius, running along through that Valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and unpassable Bog; a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main Rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climb in the Mountains; but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eafie; He was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing, for the space of forty days.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore to deal with some of the Epiriots, (among whom he had many Friends) that he and the Consul had a meeting together: But nothing was effected. The Consul would have him to let all Towns of Greece at liberty; and to make amends for the Injuries, which he had done to many People in his late War. Philip was contented to give Liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such as had been long subject unto him and his Ancestors, he thought it against all Reason, that he should relinquish his Claim and Dominion over them. He also said, That as far forth as it should appear, that he had done wrong unto any Town or People whatsoever, he could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the Judgment of some free State, that had not been interested in those Quarrels. But herewithal Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no Judgment or Compromise, forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had always been the Invader; and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own Defence. After this Alteration, when they should come to particulars, and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty; the first that he named were the Thessalians. These had been Subjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the days of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore as soon as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition he would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquished. And herewithal abruptly he flung away, refusing to hear any more of such Discourse.

After this, the Consul strove in vain, two or three days together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that Passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himself, and could not resolve what course to take, there came to him an Herdsman, sent from Choregus a Prince of the Epiriots, that favoured the Romans, who having long kept Beasts in those Mountains, was thoroughly acquainted with all By-paths; and therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This Guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great Reward, in case he made good his word; had such Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day-time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the Hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them because at their Backs)

Backs) they raised a great Smoke; whereby they gave notice of their Success unto the Consul. Some Skirmishes, whilst they were on their Journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third Morning he saw the Smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his Men had attained unto the place whither they were sent: He pressed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the shoutings of those that ran down the Hill, and charged Philip on the back, astonished to the Macedonians, that they brook themselves to flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the Danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the Passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him; he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken Troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest loss was of his Camp and Provisions; if not rather perhaps of his Reputation; for that the Macedonians began to stand in fear, lest now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their Party against the Enemy upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better persuaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they could not be persuaded thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient Habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not stay to use any great Compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him; so that a little hindrance did serve to make him break off his purpose, and withdraw himself home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Abammanians, when this fell out, were even in readiness to invade Thessaly; wherunto the way lay more open, out of their several Countries. When therefore they heard for certain, that Philip was beaten by the Romans, they foreloved not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaming after their Harveft, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few days since had made them to be very desirous, wasted by the fame Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themselves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault; Metropolis and riera yielded unto him. Rhage he besieged, and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philippolis at the same time, having somewhat recollected his Spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well near spent his Victuals, and seeing no hope to prevail at Rhage, brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an haven Town of Phecia, on the Gulf of Corinth; which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the People, as because it lay conveniently feared between Thessaly and other Regions, wherein he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phecia he van by assault; many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Consul's Brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joynt with King Attalus and the Rhodians Fleet. They van two Cities in Eubœa, and afterward laid siege unto Cenchreæ, an Haven and Arsenal of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This Enterprife did somewhat help forward the Æthiopes in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to pass, that Cenchreæ, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly, should be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other Motives inducing the Æthiopes to prefer the Friendship of the Romans, before the Patronage of Philip, whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many ways offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being entangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such Councils, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous Practices to make himself their absolute Lord; his poisoning of Aratus their old Governour; his false dealing with the Messenians, Epiriots, and other People their Confederates, and his own Dependants; together with many particular Outrages by him committed, had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary Evil, even whilst they were unable to be without his Assistance. But since, by the Virtue of Philopemen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength, so as without the Macedonian help, they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon renounce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceive how they stood affected; and therefore he sent Murders to take away the life of * Philopemen. But failing in this Enterprife, and being directed, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopemen wrought so with the Æthiopes, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonians. Cyclades, a principal man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himself passionate in the cause of Philip, and Æthiopes chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them in Society with the Romans.

These News were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Æthiopes, to treat with the Æthiopes, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them, if they would forsake the Macedonians. A Parliament of the Æthiopes was held at Sejym, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty Cause. Therein the Romans and their Adherents desired the Æthiopes to joyn with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Æthiopes of their Alliance with the King, and of their Faith due unto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate Request of

* Plut. in vita Philopem. l. 29.

Philip's Embassadors, did no way advance his Master's Cause: rather it gave the Achaean to understand, That he who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himself unable to gratify them in any reciprocal Demand. Yet were there many in that great Council, who remembering the Benefits of Philip and Antigon, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late Injuries, and expectation of like, or worse from him in the future, prevailed against the Memory of those old good turns, which he, (and Antigon before him) had partly sold unto them, and partly had used as Baits, whereby to allure them into absolute Subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least Importance, that the Romans were strong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much Altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his Enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodian they forthwith entered into Society; with the Romans, (because no League would be of force, until the Senate and People had approved it) they forbore to decree any Society at the present, until the return of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitan, Dimeas, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many Respects they were bound; rose up out of the Council, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with Honesty thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thank, that all the rest of the Achaean may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the Affection of the Citizens discovered it felt plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his Hands, if they might have any small assistance. Philoetes, a Lieutenant of the King's, lay then in Corinth; which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus: Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude ready to join with him, he easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his Reputation, so it gave him hope to obtain some good end by Treaty, whilst as yet with his Honour he might seek it; and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conful would shortly be chosen, who should take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himself; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to predispole things unto a Conclusion, for his own Reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sabbath, in the Bay then called the Alban, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulf of Ziton, in the Argen Sea, or Archeipelago. Thither came Titus, with Antenor the Albanian, an Embassador of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Achaean and Achaean. Philip had with him some few of his own Captains, and Cydnus, lately banished for his take out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore; though learning (as he said) none but the several Gods; yet misdoubling some Treachery in the Achaian. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans were, That he should for all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all Prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise whatsoever he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoever about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemy then King of Egypt, after his Father's death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Towns, and Temples, by him taken and spoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodian would have his Garrisons out of divers Towns about the Hellefpont, and other Havens of their Friends. The Achaian desired Restitution of Argos and Corinth; about the one of which they might not unjustly quarrel with him; the other had been long his own by their consent. The Achaian took upon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece; willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and withal to deliver up unto them whatsoever he held that had ever at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithal content, but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly, corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the victors, by distributing, when he was vanquished, those Towns, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapert Achaian, Philip commanded his Galley to row near the Shore. But they began to ply him afresh, telling him, That he must obey his Betters, unless he were able to defend himself by force of Arms. He answered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with sundry Scoffs, and especially with one, which made the Roman Conful understand what manner of Companions these Achaian were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them, as likewise the rest of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoil from spoil; yet could he get no better an Answer, than that they would Exempt Joener take Etolia out of Etolia. Titus wondered Philoetes what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custom, as often as War happened between their Friends, to hold up the Quarrel, by sending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he said it was strange that the Achaian should be so careful thereof, since divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Gracians; wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make Slaves of those Achaian, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat smiled; and was no whit offended to hear the Achaian well railed up; touching whom, he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at liberty; Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatness of the Romans; though he would also consider what might befall his own Dignity. But that the Achaian, Rhodian, and other petty Estates, should thus presume under Countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might, he should be heretofore compelled; it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous Intolerance. The Achaian he charged with much Ingratitude, reciting against them some Decrees of their own; wherein they had laden both Antigon and him, with more than human Honours. Nevertheless he said, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himself. Thus he addressed himself wholly to the Roman General; unto whom,

if he could give satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodian, his late War, (he said) was only defensive, they having been the offenders; or if he gave them any occasion, it was only in helping Perseus, his Son-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather law; neither did he see why they should rather law; neither did he see why they should rather law; whereas they complained, That spoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove and pleasant Walks thereabouts; what could he do more than send Gardiners thither with young Plants, if one King of another would stand to ask such recompence. Thus he jested the matter out, but offered, nevertheless, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Peraa to the Rhodian; as likewise to Attalus the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then Possession. Thus ended that days conference, because it was late; Philip requiring a Night's leisure to think upon the Articles, which were many; and he ill provided of Counsel wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsel, said Titus, you may even thank your self; as having murdered all your Friends, that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night, excusing his long stay by the weightiness of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was believed, that he thereby sought to abridge the Achaian of leisure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired Conference in private with the Roman General. The Sum of his Discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give to the Achaian both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodian what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Achaian, that he would grant some part of their Demands; and to the Romans whatsoever they did challenge. This when Titus his Associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would shortly get Possession of all which he now rendered up. The noise that they made came to Philip's ear; who thereupon did fire a third day of meeting, and protested, that if he could not persuade them, he would suffer himself to be persuaded by them. So the third day they met early in the Morning; at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken unto offers of Peace, and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendered; or otherwise that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would refer himself to the courtesy of the Senate.

This was even as Quintus would have it, who stood in doubt, lest a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the Honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he easily prevailed with the rest to assent thereto; forasmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the War; and since, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed resolutely either in War or Peace. Further he willed them to send their several Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their Prejudice. Among the rest he persuaded King Ammander to make a Journey to Rome, in person, knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the concurrence of so many Embassadors, would serve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure, that his own Command of the Army in Greece, might be prorogued. And to the time end he had dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome, who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alleged unto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate, which was more desirous of Victory than of Satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to set Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected, unless special care were taken, that the King should be disposed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servility, that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they had desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration, they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias? Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had given them no Direction or Commission what to say or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philip's desire of Peace, wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Achaian, Achaean, nor any of their Fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any Claim to either of these Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaian had some right, (though their right were no better, than that having stolen it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by Bargain unto another) Philip had already confessed to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alleged, even against the Greeks in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintus his Friends, that so he might have had the Honour to conclude the War, if a Successor had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue General, neither his Friends at Rome, nor he himself, after the return of the Embassadors unto Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of Peace.

Philip seeing that the Achaian had forsaken him, and joyned with their common Enemies, thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himself unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many years past, since the Lacedaemonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaian together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted in a manner wholly in his Mercenaries, for he was a Tyrant, though stilling himself King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaian, and therefore seemed unto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned over into his hands, in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philoetes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Master's purpose to make a freight alliance with the Lacedaemonians, by giving some Daughters of his own in Marriage unto Nabis his Sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some Scruple ple in accepting the Town of Argos; unless by decree of the Citizens themselves, he might be called into it. Hereabout Philoetes dealt with the Argives; but found them to averte, that, in open Assembly of the People, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philoetes, without more ado, to make over the Town, which he was ready to receive. Philoetes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives; who for very long had forsaken the Achaean, to take his part. Early in the Morning, the Tyrant made himself Master of all the Gates. A few of the principal men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their Goods confiscated. The rest of the chief Citizens that staid behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of Money was laid upon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long upon the matter; or plaid the thieves, in purloining their own goods, they were put to the Whip, and besides loss of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Laws: namely such, as might serve to make him gracious with the rascal Multitude: abrogating all Debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poor. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it had been an old custom of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, he sent the news to T. Quintius; and offered to join with him against Philip. Quintius was glad of it: so he took the pains to cross over the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some civil touching Argos), and the Tyrant lent unto the Romans six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achaean, upon a Truce for four Months, reserving the final conclusion of Peace between them until the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIV.

The Battle at Cyncephale, wherein Philip was conquered by T. Quintius.

T. Quintius, as soon as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his Negotiation of Peace, and no less failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himself.

Quintius had in his Army about six and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Quintius heard that Philip was in Thessaly; and thereupon addressed himself to seek him out. They had like to have met unawares, near unto the City of Pherae: where the Vant-couriers on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof unto their several Captains. But neither of them were over-hasty, to commit all to hazard upon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better discovery. These met, and fought a while: returning finally back into their several Camps, with little advantage unto either side. The Country about Pherae was thick set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens, and Mud-walls; which made it unproper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove back unto Sestus, in the Frontier of Macedon: where he might be plentifully served with all necessaries. Quintius conceived a right meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of Hills; which hindered the one from knowing what coursed the other took. Nevertheless they encamped not far asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them understood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers again, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long Fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply, that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not been deperate, the Romans, their fellows, had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Quintius himself was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a Battle in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuously, how the Enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: inasmuch as he embattled his Men; and climbed up those Hills, which for that the troops thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs Heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cyncephale. As soon as he was on the Hill-top; it did him good to see, that they of his own light-armed were busie in fight, almost at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so far. He had also liberty to chafe his ground, as might serve best his advantage: inasmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great use: the roughness of the place among those Dogs-heads, as they were called, serving nothing apply for his Phalanx. Nevertheless he found convenient room, wherein to marshal the one part of his Army; and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the rest; embattalling them as they might. Whilst he was doing this, he perceived that his Horsemen, and light-armed, began to shrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legion, by force whereof they were driven to recoil. He sent forward to help them; and they no less hastily drew unto him for succour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx, to charge those Pikes, and entertain them. Here Quintius found an extreme difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx, being a great square battal of armed Pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our modern Wars; and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targetiers, as long as the Phalanx it self held together undivided. The Macedonians were embattalled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the Pikes of the first rank, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with Ten Enemies at once; and not able to come nearer unto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Quintius finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he observed, that they which were appointed by Philip, to make his left Wing, were not able, through the much unevenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder he made great and present use. He caused the right Wing of his Battal to march up the Hill, against these ill-ordered Troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terror. The Macedonians were readier to dispart what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chief. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their Weapons useless. For let it be supposed, that Philip having fix and twenty thousand in his Army (as he is said to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thousand Horse, four thousand Targetiers, and four thousand light-armed: so shall there remain fourteen thousand Pikes; whereof he himself had embattled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left Wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having usually sixteen in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have well near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty; or seven and thirty Files, might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targetiers, or light-armed.

Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and forty Paces; that is, very near a quarter of a Mile in length. Such a space of open Champain, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disjoin this close battal of the Phalanx; was not every where to be found. Here at Cyncephale, Philip had so much room, as would only suffice for the one half of his Men: the rest were fain to stand still, and look about them; being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughness of the Dogs-heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in masting those Enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the difcommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to beaze themselves unto flight. A Roman Tribune, or Colonel, seeing the Victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Ensigns, or Maniples; that is, (as they might fall off) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory complet. He considered, that Philip, in pursuing the right Wing of the Romans, was run on so far; as that himself, with his fellows, in mounting the Hill, to charge the left Wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings Head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand; and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rear. The hindmost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed, save the first five, were accustomed, when the Battels came to joyning, to carry their Pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies, to thrust on their foremen: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx; that it served neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the four sides of it were as so many Fronts, looking fundry ways, because he expected, that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be understood, that herein he altered the usual form; as also at the same time he embattled his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turn their Weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, that Alexander's men being thus disposed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the Enemy, unless their hindmost ranks could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise unable to help themselves, threw down their Weapons, and fled. The King himself had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside, with a Troop of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his Men casting down their Weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he presently becock himself to fight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battel, about seven hundred: of the Macedonians, about eight thousand were slain, and five thousand taken Prisoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falls out with the Aetolians; and grants Truce unto Philip, with Conditions, upon which the Peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

THE Aetolians wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to have it noised through all Greece, That the Victory at Cyncephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They

They had gotten indeed the most of the booty ; by taking the Macedonian Camp, whilst the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition ; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece ; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battle, Titus made haste unto Larissa, a City of Thessaly ; which he presently took. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers, to burn all his Letters, and passages of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much adversity, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their Neighbours, did make delay of opening their Gates to Titus. At the same time, the Town of Leucas bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet : and very soon after all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip ; gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the Victory at Cyncephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the Conquest of Peræa, a Region of the Continent over-against their Island ; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks : forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans ; but with an Army of their own, and some help which they borrowed of the Acheans, and other their friends, gave battle to Dimerates, the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the Victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom ; waiving and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste, of six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horses : wherewith coming upon them, he drove them, with little or no loss of his own, and great laughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one Enterprize, he had success answerable to his desire : but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yield unto necessity ; and therefore sent in all haste Limæus and Demophilus, with Cycladus, the banished Achean, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus, and some of his Roman Colonels : by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seems that they had Commission to refer all unto Titus his own discretion ; as Philip himself in few days after did. There was granted unto them a Truce for fifteen days : in which time, the King himself might come and speak with the Roman General. In the mean season many suspicious rumours went of Titus ; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief Authors : who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honesty, where profited them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent Letters unto his Associates ; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entered into consultation before the Kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Estate in particular. The poor King Aminander, befought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think upon him ; and considering his weakness, which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him, who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians : who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates, to advise upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely : added, That in the main of the purpose which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived : for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the fair promises made by Titus himself unto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customs which they generally held : for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seek the utter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made War with them ; until by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable Example : adding, That Victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement unto moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece : it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedonia should be greatly weakened and brought low ; nor that it should be utterly destroyed : forasmuch as it served as a bar, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other savage Nations, which would soon overflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto those demands wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty ; then was there no reason to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians : if they thought otherwise, it should be at their own pleasure, to take counsel apart for themselves, as they thought good. Then began Phœnus, an other of the Ætolians, to say, That all was come to nothing ; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no less than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leave his babbling ; saying, That himself would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither : whom Titus used friendly : and suffering him to repose himself that night, held a Council the day following : wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands ; offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phœnus, the Ætolian, inflicting over him, said it was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of the Towns (which he there named) bidding him speak, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himself, said, it should be otherwise ; These were Thessalian Towns, and should all be free : one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refused to commit it self to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phœnus cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to defraud them of the Towns that had sometime belonged unto their Common-weal. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant between them and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing, save the Pillage and Captives. It is true, that there had been such a Condition in the former War : but it ceased to be of any validity, as soon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand ; asking them, whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which he had let in the Romans by composition, should be delivered into subjection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages between the Romans and the Ætolians : neither had they great reason, to fear any hard measure ; since Titus was so earnest in behalf of those Thessalians, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their Gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves ; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for four Months.

The chief cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custom by him before alledged ; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motive ; even the consideration, that his Successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his Letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Confuls were chosen : who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the Peace ; alledging frivolous matter of their own suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded, and the Letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side ; and the importunity of the Confil on the other ; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as soon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an assembly of the people ; by whose sovereign authority it was concluded, That Peace should be granted unto the King. So Ten Embassadors were sent from Rome over into Greece : in which number were they, that had been Confils before Titus : and it was ordained by their advice, That Titus should go through with the business of Peace. Thesewould very fain have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias ; until the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed fo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered unto the Acheans ; and all the other Greek Towns which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, returned unto liberty.

The Conditions of the Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, he should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek Towns which he held ; and consign them over to the Romans : That he should deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's : Likewise all his Ships of War, reserving to himself only five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatness, wherein sixteen men laboured at every Oar : Further, that he should pay a thousand Talents, the one half in hand, the other in Ten years next following, by even portions. Hereto Livy adds, That he was ^{Liv. 33.} forbidden to make Mar out of Macedonia, without permission of the Senate. But I find not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred Talents he had already delivered unto Titus, together with his younger Son Demetrius, to remain as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of Peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome : when it was promised, that the Money, and his Son, should be restored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this Money were reckoned as part of the thousand Talents, I cannot find, and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who together with those four hundred Talents, was given for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus, unto Prusias, King of Bithynia : giving him time to understand, what agreement was made with Philip, in behalf of the Greeks ; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip, to gratify this Bithynian, his Son in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these Letters wrought, it was not greatly material ; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such way, that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain, which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves aggrieved, that they were utterly neglected ; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonian ; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans : who seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus ; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had born unto him ; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have an hand in the Execution ; yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the Murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture ; the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans ; in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found fraying from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was decreed within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the Murderers delivered into his hands ; and for five hundred Soldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred Talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with Excuses ; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Acheans and Ateniens, informing them what had happened : and requested them not to take it amiss, though

This good will of all the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their War against Antiochus, than could have been the possession of a few Towns; yea, or of all those Provinces which were named in their Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof; no sooner were these Jewishmen Games at an end, than Tirius, with the Romans that were of his Council, gave audience to Hegesias, and Lyfias, King Antiochus's Embassadors: whom they wished to signify unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with War:

The business being dispatch'd, it remained, that all care should be us'd, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about unto others, to pra-dipose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad: I refer unto another place.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the

§. I

What King's, of the Races of Seleucus and Ptolemy, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

of the Milefians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless, War with Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to Wife Berenice the Daughter of Ptolemy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings Daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement: and that which followeth.

Protemy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Arfinoe) a very excellent Prince : whose favour, the worthiest of that Race, Is He, that built and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, and to honour the more, He sent unto Eleeazar, then high Priest of the Jews, for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews, had formerly been very great : for He had set at liberty as many of them, as his Father held in slavery throughout all Aegypt; and he had sent unto the Temple of God in Hierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleeazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew Copy; which Protemy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons, that could be found at among all the Tribes. In this number of the seventy two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy; Jefus the Son of Sirach, is thought by Generatur to have been one: who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticisticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Jofephus affirms) by Ariftarchus that was employed therein. Forty years Ptolemy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloved of his People; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former years; in which time he bestowed, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been carried into his honourable deeds, it might have been stored with the most glorious, the Gods with which he was often troubled, was enough to reward him his own error. He was the first of the Kings derived from Alexanders Successors, that entered in to League with the Romans: as also his Ordering was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

Antiochus Theos had another Wife, called Laudice, at such time as he married with Berenice the Daughter of this Ptolemy. After his second marriage, he used his first Wife with no better regard, than if he had been his Concubine. Laudice hated him for this: yet adventured not to seek revenge; until her own Son Seleucus Callinicus, was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus: at what time the poysoned her Husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her Son, murdered Berenice, together with a Son that she had born to Antiochus. Justin reports, that Berenice faved herself, together with the young Prince her Child, awhile in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her Brother Ptolemy Euergetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slain before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father that had fifteen years been King, began his Reign. His Subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature, which they did covered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have been much endangered, if Ptolemy Euergetes, who came against him, had not been drawn back into his own Country, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would bear Arms against Ptolemy, in defence of their own King: but rather they sided with the Egyptians; who took Laudice the Kings Mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestical troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Egypt, went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own Subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had been much better, by well defending, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himself any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarked himself; and, putting to Sea, met with such a tempest, as devoured all save himself, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked Body, turned nevertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subjects understood, in what sort the Gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his estate; and, presuming that he would thenceforth become a new Man, offered him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him with such spirit; as, thinking himself well enough able to deal with the Egyptians, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it was at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemy in a great Battel: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late Shipwreck. Having therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemy would soon be at his Heels; He wrote unto his Brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, yet extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himself great. He levied a mighty Army of the Gauls; whereupon he set forwards to help his Brother; or rather to get what he could for himself. Hereof Ptolemy being advertized: and having no desire to put himself in danger more than needed; took Truce with Seleucus for ten years. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian War, but his Brother Antiochus came upon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himself to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished again; and faved himself, with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the Battel. Thus did Gods justice take revenge of those murders, by which the Crown was purchased; and sealed (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was glad to hear of his Brothers death; as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergeum, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reign: these perfidious Barbarians took Counsel against him; and devised how to strip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal House to make head against them; it would be in their power, to do what should best be pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himself with Money, as if he had been their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as rendered little to his honour. In the mean while Seleucus had gathered a new Army; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his Brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the safest way for himself, to make his profit of their discord: which is no great marvel; since he had great reason to stand in no less fear of the Gauls, his own Souldiers, than of the Enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes was much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his Brother. In the second Battel, fought between the Brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawk, (which surname was given him, because he fought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as far as he could, both from his Brother, and from his own Gauls. Having fetched a great compass through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his Father in Law King Artabanus took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in ourward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bellow himself upon Ptolemy: his own conscience telling him, what evil he had meant unto Seleucus, his Brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find no sure harbour. Ptolemy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close Prison: whence though by means of an Harlot he got out; yet flying from his Keepers, he fell into the hands of Thieves, by whom he was murdered. Near about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his Wars with his Brother. He therefore made a Journey against Aspasius eviler of the Parthian Kingdom: wherein his ill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered to closely to him, that he was taken Prisoner. Aspasius dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royal entertainment: but in returning home home, he break his neck by a fall from his Horse, and so ended his unhappy Reign of twenty years. He had to Wife Laudice, the Sister of Antiochus one of his most trusty Captains: which was Father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he himself styled himself) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By great trouble of the world the third, surnamed Cerannus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Cerannus reigned only three years: in which time he made War upon Antiochus the first, that was King of Pergeum. Being weak of Body through sickness, and in want of Money, He could not keep his Men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by Treason of Nicanor, and Aspasius a Gaul. His death was revenged by Achæus, who slue the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the Brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his Reign. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The Rebellion of Molo; and Expedition of Antiochus against him. The reconcomence of Antiochus his Egyptian War: with the passages between the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemy; and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his Rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings Reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteen years old, when he began his Reign, which lasted six and thirty years. In his Minority, He was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious Man; and one which maligned all verue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himself; the success of things will shortly discover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his Reign, Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his Heir Ptolemy Philopator, a young Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achæans; who afterwards took part with Cleomenes; and lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene; by taking to Wife Berenice, the Daughter of King Mages. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the deer of gods, was given him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoils which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Perfia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer covetousness of Money, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of twenty Talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Jolephus a Jew; unto whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and Cu-roms, that belonged unto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Celestria, with Palæstina and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as having fallen to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slain in the Battel at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The Victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding Ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by St. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes Reigned six and twenty years; and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seem by that, which we find in the Prologue unto Jesus the Son of Sirach his Book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his Father: or that those eight and thirty years, were the years of Jesus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did other whiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes: Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Celestria and the Countries adjoining. This Council was very unseasonably given; when Adolus, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into Rebellion, and fought to make himself absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more forward than wise, maintained fifty, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful; whilst He in person made War upon one, that was like himself a King. No Man durst gainstay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achæan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition unto Celestria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laudicea, and so over the Defarts into the Valley of Marsyas; between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Arabian, that served under Ptolemy. So he consumed the time there awhile to nons effect: and then came news, that Xenatas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army; and Adolus thereby became Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his Journey, and drew near to the River of Tigris; received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills drawn by their Commander to bear Arms against the King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himself stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his Enemy: left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp; and with all the flour of his Army went over Tigris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his Horse to give impediment; but hearing that Xenatas could not so be stopped,

He himself dislodged, and took his Journey towards Hemila; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrustful of the faith of his own Souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy; the great folly of Xenetas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenetas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume, that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the Sword. Wherefore he suffered his Men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp; or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the Journey, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himself, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tigris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings Men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good cheer, that they had spent at Supper. So Xenetas and a very few about him, didighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this victory, the Rebel marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took; and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country down to the Red Sea, or Bay of Persia. He halted unto Susa: where at his first coming he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this business.

The report of these things coming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marijass: filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counsel what to do, in this needful case; and was well advised by Epienes the best Man of War he had about him, to let alone this Enterprize of Celestria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This Counsel was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epienes diffinied by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counsel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the Journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrustful his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, or any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him, to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this; He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which, by some error, took alarm at his return; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giving battle to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few Men, or Ensigns: but all the left wing of the Army, which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the victory: but Molo thorned the work, by killing himself; as did also divers of his friends, who for fear of torments prevented the Hang man with their own Swords.

After this victory came joyful news, that the Queen Laudice, Daughter of Mithradates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a Son. Fortune seemed bountiful unto the King; and therefore he purposed to make what use he could, of her friendly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Eastern parts of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to visit his Frontiers; were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour; as considering what good might thereby happen to himself. For if it should come to pass, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthening his own Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropariens; having the greater part of his Kingdom, situate between the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearful; and therefore yielded unto whatsoever Conditions pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this Journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was unto the People; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this, having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for fear of him, to utter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done; he being trained forth by a sleight a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have used so much art, in ridding his hands of a Man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilst he was alive: yet they that for fear had been most obsequious to him, whilst he was in case to do them hurt, were as ready as the foremost, to speak of him as he had deserved; when once they were secure of him. Yea his Wife and Children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the Wives and Children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we speak before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Diamond upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the Enterprize; and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus notwithstanding the notice which he had taken, of these his traitorous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all; and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldened the Traitor: who being already doted, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Celestria; or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemy Philopater in those parts.

He

he began with Seleucia, a very strong City near unto the mouth of the River Orontes, which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with Bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia; but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemy Evergetes having lately won it, might, if it had to pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolemaea. Such is the vanity of men that hope to purchase an endless memorial unto their Names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their Vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodorus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Celestria in the behalf of Ptolemy, was now grown sorry that he had used so much faith and diligence in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercenary, he began to have regard unto his own profit; which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionless) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up to Antiochus, the Cities of Tyros and Ptolemais. Whilst he was devising about this Treason, and had already sent Messengers to King Antiochus, his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemy's Captains, that was more faithful than himself. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way, and afterwards got Possession, not only of Tyros and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens, but of so many other Towns in that Countrey, as emboldened him to think upon making a Journey into Egypt: it fell. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time, Ptolemy himself being loth to have his Pleasures interrupted with business of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdom. Wherefore these two agreed together to make provision as busily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the War; and nevertheless, at the same time to press Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good Agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Bizantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians, according to the usual courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the Quarrel. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius; who entreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treaty lasted, great Preparations were made at Alexandria for the War, wherein these two Counsellors perfwaded themselves reasonably, that the Victory would be their own, if they could get for Money a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet; whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the Disposition of Ptolemy, but because the Rhodiens, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one manner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles and his Fellow. Antiochus therefore having wearied himself at the long Siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win; and being desirous to refresh himself and his Army in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on, granted unto the Egyptian a Truce for four Months, with promise that he would be ready to hearken unto equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would fain have seemed, but only to lull his Enemies asleep, whilst he took time to refresh himself, and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose Treason daily grew more open and violent. The flame negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, he used himself; as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needful, for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless he gave audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt, pleasing himself well to dispute about the Justice of his Quarrel, which he purposed shortly to make good by the Sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in Possession to Seleucus; and that this Bargain was afterwards ratified by general Consent of all the Confederates after the Battle at Issus. But Ptolemy's men would acknowledge no such Bargain. They said, That Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, had won Celestria and the Provinces adjoining, for himself; as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus; by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for Peace, they were in the end of their Disputations far from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Also Ptolemy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; but Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deal with another, as to take his Rebel unto Protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Sovereign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the Field again, contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemy with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captains of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the year before. They held against him the Passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drove them; and proceeding onward in his Journey, wan so many places that he greatly increased his Reputation, and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his Followers. As the two Kings drew near together, many Captains of Ptolemy forsook his Pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the Courage to meet his Enemy in the Field. The Battle was fought at Raphia, where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls); but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Antiochus his Sister and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; as the like did Antiochus on the other side, each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of their Ancestors, as not having of their own, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants; as also his being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten those of Affrica. Wherefore, by the advantage of these Beasts, he drove the Enemies before him, in that part of the Battle wherein he fought himself. But Ptolemy had the better men, by whose valour he brake the Grofs of his Enemy's Batel, and wan the Victory.

Provinces after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard, shortly they fell to Eumenes, then to Antigonus, and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus, under whose Posterity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustful infolency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished, and thought to be slain by the Gauls, did stir up Arsaces, a Noble man of the Country, to seek revenge of Injuries done, and animate him to rebel. So he flew the King's Lieutenant, made himself King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings, and took Seleucus Callinicus Prisoner in battle, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Herby he won Reputation as a lawful King, and by good Government of his Country, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his Successors, like as that of the Ptolemys in Egypt, and that of the Caesars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled, though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucids beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plainfield, but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and Passages of Mountains. The resistances they made, availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well fortified, as he needed not to turn out of the way from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their Mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either gerabore the Enemies heads, or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often employ against them his light armature, wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Arsaces, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own Subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad ways, and deserts, would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey without proceeding much further. This not to falling out, He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wilderness, through which his Enemy must pass, to be dammed up and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himself out of the way: suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Country; wherein, without some Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, that Arsaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where he won Tambraxe the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other losses, caused Arsaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a Battle. The issue thereof was such, as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arsaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiss, to make him a Friend, whom he could not make a Subject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors; but having gotten the Kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it to himself. With Euthydemus he fought a Battle by the River Arius, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not so greatly to his Honour, as was the Testimony which he gave of his own private Valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned himself more courageously, than did any one man in all his Army. His Horse was slain under him: and he himself received a wound in his Mouth, whereby he lost some of his Teeth. As for Euthydemus; he withdrew himself back into the further parts of his Kingdom; and afterwards protraded the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjustly usurped from him; Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the Children of the Ulupurs: and further, That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should join, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own weariness, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the Son of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Ambassador in this Treaty of Peace; was not a little available unto a good Conclusion. For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in Marriage one of his own Daughters: and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom; causing him nevertheless to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himself by Oath to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the Borders of India: where he renewed with Sophagolenus, King of the Indians, the Society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexander's death. Eumenes in his War against Antigonus, raised part of his Forces out of their Country. But when Antigonus after his Victory turned Westward, and was over-busied in a great Civil War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stir up his Countrymen to Rebellion; making himself their Captain, and taking upon him as Protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention; into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself, (having an Army of six hundred thousand Men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexander's. In this Estate he had well confirmed himself, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself, at the coming of Seleucus: but met him in Field, as ready to defend his own; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both Peace and Affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of love between their Children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings.

Neither

Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many Generations, any business worthy of remembrance with the Western Countries. The posterity of Sandrocottus, is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the days of Augustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greek: wherein, among other things, he said, That he had command over six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundry Authors, the mention of some which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all adventures of the same Race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagolenus, carried himself as the worthier person, receiving Presents: and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Poenates, not only in the higher Asia, but all the Poenates of the lower, humbled themselves unto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his own Greatness within few years ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans; whose Greatness was the same in deed, that his was only in seeming.

§. III.

The last Reign of Ptolemy Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his Favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolemy Epiphane, the Son of Philopator. His resolution in preparing for divers Wars at once. His Voyage toward the Hellespont. He seeks to hold Amity with the Romans, who make friendly show to him; intending nevertheless to have War with him. His doings about the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while, and study which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolemy Philopator died: leaving his Son Ptolemy Epiphane, a young Boy, his Successor in the Kingdom; unlikely by him to be well defended, against a Neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemy, furnished Philopator, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meek derision; as he that was young, being newly past his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beaustiness of all his following life, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battle at Raphia, he gave himself over to sensuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet, called Agathobolus. At her instigation he murdered his own Wife and Sister; which had adventured herself with him, in that only dangerous Action by him undertaken, and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-Ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathobolus, and her brother Agathobolus, and of Oenantes, a filthy Bawd, that was Mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Country, till Philopator died: who having reigned Seventeen years, left none other Son than Ptolemy Epiphane, a child of five years old, begotten on Arsinoe, that was his Sister and Wife. After the Kings death, Agathobolus began to take upon him, as Protector of young Epiphane, and Governor of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary Forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemy the first, and would not be accounted Egyptian; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his Sister Agathobolus, with the young King in her arms, began a solemn Oration. He told them, That the deceased Father of this their King, had committed the child into the arms of his Sister, but unto the Faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdom did now rely. He besought them therefore, that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King against the Treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traitorously went about to set the Diadem upon his own head, being a meer stranger to the Royal Blood. Herewithal he produced before them a Witness, that should justify his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a feigned passion of Sorrow, and counterfeiting of Tears: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was, to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so broke up the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathobolus therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified; thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner, by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the Mother-in-law of Alexander; and cast her into Prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds; wherein they had conceived extreme rage, against these three pernicious misgovernors of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injury done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with fear of harm; which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to do unto the City. For he was, though a man most unfit for Government, as afterwards he proved; yet no bad Soldier, and well beloved of the Army. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of Victuals, which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people: so for the remedy which Agathobolus used, were the Macedons more hostile, and more violently stirred unto uproar. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of Conspiracy against him; and delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poor Soldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparel, to be tormented. But whilst the Whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readiness for that purpose: there was brought unto the Minister of Agathobolus, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room; leaving Maragamis, the Soldier, alone by himself, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveyed himself out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Privileges, as are the Turks Janizars. Being assured therefore, that one of their fellows had thus been

...to his own honour

These Ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintus, and acquaint him with the purport of the Senate; whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto Peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece, for the execution of their late Decree; That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a Party strong against him. Neither was the Senate altogether unmindful of the business: wherein still T. Quintus, with his Ten Ambassadors, should happen to forget any any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Ptolemy. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassy. For coming to Syria; and there understanding that P. Villius was and L. Terentius, having been sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia. He halted thither; whether also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors) from Bargile, to be present at the Conference. Hegesias and Lysias were also there; the fame, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptory Commissions, which the Embassadors present shall expound unto their Matter. After a few days Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his Errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Ptolemy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that War, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Eurepe; for that other cause of his Journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make War upon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That he wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia; whereas He prayed them to let him alone; even as He, without such curiosity, suffered them to do in Italy, what they thought good. As for his coming over into Eurepe: they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely, the War against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that Country. He derived it from Selenus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversy between him and the other Kings, had been still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindered by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he wished them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this City upon one of his Sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholden unto him, and to joyne ere long with Ptolemy, not only in friendship, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it; would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Swertia and of Lamphacra, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lamphacra being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few days, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such fort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the War by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their Swords; nor yet over modestly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious guests; that would take no answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certain author, That Ptolemy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and let the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Antiochus; or, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemy; which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian Voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to beher in Egypt with the first. To his Son Selenus he committed his Army; and left him to oversee the rebuilding of Lysimachia: but all his Sea forces He took along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus, not long with him, and failed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honesty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his Voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a Tempest, with a grievous Shipwrack, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Selenia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered secure, as might appear, of the Roman War.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at last it was not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him Council, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans; but to desire Society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same Friends and Enemies. And this he advised him to do quickly before the War broke out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seem, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the Friendship of the People of Rome. It was needless to say plainly whether this Entreaty tended: the forward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had been during the War. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cried out, that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them; upbraiding upbraiding withal the Romans, as Men to them beholding; not only for their Victory over Philip; but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs; and then should all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended against Antiochus. The fame herof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the Enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate; and to chase out of their City this honourable Man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his virtue against them in the Civil administration; and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject unto them, the Lives, Goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they use this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his Enemies; which being once known, He was sure to be soon accused and condemned.

In this their important rule of the City, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By virtue of which Office, though he was superior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto such an annual Magistrature, as at the years end must be acceptable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quæstors, or Officers of the Treasury, to come and speak with him: the proud Quæstor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal; and Men of his place, were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of his future Greatness. But he had not to do with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Purfivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgment before a public assembly of the People. There he not only shewed, what the undutiful stubbornness of this Quæstor had been; but how unsupportable the infolency of all the Judges at the present was: whose unbridled power, made them to regard neither Laws nor Magistratures. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the general good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from year to year, and no one Man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been passed, before he passed over Iberus; it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levy by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting Money in their publick Treasury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal considering this, began to examine the publick Revenues; and to take a perfect note both how much came into the Treasury, by ways and means whatsoever; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Commonwealth did not exhaust the Treasury: but that wicked Magistratures, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the Monies to their own use, were thereby fain to load the People with needless burdens. Herof he made such plain demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore with shame, what they had gotten by Knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poor shifts; as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their own Estate. But as the virtue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the Peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extremely; as being ill fripp of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent Letters to their Friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barbians Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in Arms. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in Peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barbians might well cry out, That having done their best already to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of War. But their own inventions they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wild Beast, which would never be tamed: That secret Messages past between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their Letters craftily, every one to the best of his own Friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither public notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false Witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in War they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus; whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their comings; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some Controversies, between the Carthaginians and Melanissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a Man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particulars. Having openly shewed himself, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly. He went forth of the Town when it began to was dark, accompanied with two who were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readiness at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own, by the Sea side. There had he a Ship furnished with all things needful; as having long expected the necessity of some such Journey. So He had Africk tarvel; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Passing over to the life of Cæcina; he found there in the Haven some Merchants Ships of Carthage. They falted him refpectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He faid, He went Embaffador to Tyre: and that he intended therein to the Ifland to Tyre: and that he intended therein to the Ifland to make a facifice; whereon He invited all the Merchants, and Mafters of the Ships. It was not weather: and therefore He would needs hold his Feaft upon the Shore; where, becaufe there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sales and Yards to be used inftead of Tents. They did fo; and Feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there afleep; and putting to Sea, held on his courfe to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was fure not to be perfued. For the Merchants did neither make hafte to fend any news of him to Carthage; as thinking him to be gone Embaffador: neither could they, without fome lofs of time, fuch of them as made moft fpeed homeward, get away from Cercina; being bufied awhile in fitting their Tackle. At Carthage, the mifs of fo great a Perfon was diversly conftrued. Some gueffed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been feen: and then the Roman Embaffadors, having none other Errand thither, accufed him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only difcovered the mifchief by them intended againft him, and the malice of their Senate; miffing the while their purpofe, and caufing Men to understand, that He fled not thus without great reafon.

Hannibal, coming to Tyre the Mother City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whole great worth and honour the Tyrans, by reafon of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have intereft. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King friendly welcomed him, and fent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoiced at his coming.

As Antiochus had caufe to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: fo had the Romans no great caufe to be therefore forry: otherwife than as they had much difgraced themselves, by difcovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike eafie unto this great Commander, to make ftout Souldiers of bafe Afians; as it had been by his training and difcipline, to make very ferviceable and skillful Men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardly though experienced. Or were it fuppofed, that one Mans worth, efpecially being fo extraordinary, could alter the nature of a Cowardly People; yet was it therewithal confiderable, that the varieties of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the bafenefs of his Flatterers, and a thoufand other fuch vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a defolate and banifhed Man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindring him in thofe actions wherein he had the high Command, and was fcondored by his Warlike Brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further ferved to hearten Antiochus, and make him lefs careful to avoid the War; then fhould it further ferve, to juftifie the Romans in their quarrel. And it feems indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making War. For Antiochus, as is faid before, having newly fent Embaffadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that He had any meaning to take Arms, unlefs by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Antiochians were greatly fufpected, as a turbulent People, defirous of innovation, and therefore prafticing with this Great King, whom they wifhed to fee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counfellors, That the Senate would grant them whatfoever with reafon they fhould ask. But this promife was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embaffadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing: but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them leaft. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwife than by fpeaking fuch words, as might halt the Romans out of Greece for very fame; who had no defire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome was of War with Antiochus: but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Antiochians were wont to upbraid the reft of the Greeks, with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed: faying, That thefe their Deliverers had laid heavier Fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer, than thofe of the Macedonians: likewife, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their Chain, and tie it about their Necks. There was indeed no caufe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplifhing of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty; and the whole Country at Peace, both with the Romans, and within it felf. As for Antiochus: He made it his daily fuit, that the Peace between him and Rome, fuch as it was, might be confirmed, and ftrengthened by a League of more affurance. Nevertheless T. Quintius would needs fear, that Antiochus meant forthwith to feize upon Greece, as foon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained ftil in his own hands Chalcus, Demetrius, and the Aceerofus: by benefit of which Towns, he might the better withftand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embaffadors, that had been fent over to affift him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they faid, would queftionlefs fall upon Greece: wherein he fhould find not only the Antiochians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do fomething againft thefe their fufpected Enemies: efpecially againft Nabis, who could worft make refiftance; whilst Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intentive to his bufinefs. Thefe reports went not only current through the City, among the vulgar: but found fuch credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, againft which time it was expected that Antiochus fhould be ready to take his great enterprife in hand; P. Cornelius, Scipio the African defired, and obtained, a fecond Confultifhip, with intimation to be General in the War, againft the King and his Hannibal. For the prefent, the bufinefs with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deal him with as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarryance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alfo he knew that many of the Greeks would not be forry; though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entered into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already fhewed, whilst he had War with Philip: and had

further been contented for the Romans fake to be at Peace with the Acheans, neither fince that time had he done any thing, whereby he fhould draw upon himfelf this War. He was indeed a defpicable Tyrant, and hated of Conditions had formerly done to them great mifchief. Titus therefore had a plaufible Theme, whereon to difcourage before the Embaffages of all the Confederate Cities; which he caufed to meet for that purpofe at Cornith. He told them, That in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearfed) that fhould fir them up, and caufe them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other intereft, than only the making perfect of their honour, in feting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in fome fort maimed, or incompleat, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in fubjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to confider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether otherwife to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Embaffador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleafing as he could devife. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was paff; extolled their virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of their Propofition: wherein unrequited they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poor Affociates, they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this He added, That great pity it was to hear, fuch notable vertue and high deferts ill fpoken of by fome, which took upon them, out of their own imaginations to foretel, what harm thefe their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulnefs rather would have required an acknowledgment, of the benefits and pleafures already received. Every one found the meaning of this laft claufe: which was directly againft the Antiochians. Wherefore Alexander the Antiochian rofe up, and told the Athenians their own putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in thofe times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty general: from which honour they were now fo far fallen. He faid, That if the Antiochians thofe whom they thought moft mighty; and by their bafe affentation, would lead all the reft into fervitude. Then fpeak He againft the Acheans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonians; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adverfity. Thefe He faid had gotten Cornith; and muft now have War be made for their fakes, to the end that they might alfo be Lords of Argos: whereas the Antiochians, that had firft made War with Philip, and always been friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of fome places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himfelf, but objected unto the Romans fraudulent dealing: fo far as much as they kept their Garrifons in Demetrius, Chalcus, and the Aceerofus; having been always wont to profefs, That Greece could never be at liberty, whilst thofe places were not free. Alfo now at laft, what elfe did they feek by this difcourfe of War with Nabis, than bufinefs wherewith to find themfelves occupied, that fo they might have fome feeming caufe of abiding longer in the Country? But they fhould do well, if they meant as they fpake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Antiochians themselves did promife, and would undertake, That they would either caufe him to yield to reafon, and relinquifh Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrifon; or elfe compel him by force of Arms, to fubmit himfelf to the good pleafure of all Greece, that was now at unity. Thefe words had been reafonable, if they had proceeded from better Men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought fo much with thefe Antiochians; as did their own ravenous defire of oppreffing others, and getting unto themfelves, that worfe would ufe it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had loft. Neither could they well diflemble this; making it no fmall part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten; wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans fhould enjoy the fpoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in poffeffion of the Antiochians. This, and the remembrance of a thoufand mifchiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Affembly, efpecially the Acheans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Antiochian Thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their Neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleafure of Titus: who faw, that by difcountenancing the Antiochians, He was become the more gracious with all the reft. But whether it pleafed him fo well, that Antiochus his Embaffadors did prefently after lie hard upon him, to draw the Peace to fome good conclusion; it may be greatly doubted. He caft them off with a flight answer: telling them, That the ten Embaffadors or Counfellors which had been fent unto him from Rome to be his affiftants in thefe matters of weight, were now returned home: and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedaemonian War; it was very foon ended. For Titus ufed the help of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againft Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he fhould have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navy, and the Rodian Fleet, were invited to the fervice: as alfo Philip of Macedon lent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in feeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the moft forward in this Expedition were the Acheans, who fet out ten thoufand Foot, and a thoufand Horfe. As for the Antiochians, rather to hold good fuffition, and found their difpofitions, than in hope to fpeed, their help was required; whereof they excufed themfelves as well as they thought beft. Thus are the Acheans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Antiochians from that degree of favour: like as they themfelves hereafter (though not in all hafte) fhall be fluppaned by the fame Lacedaemonians, againft whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives more bold than wife, began a confpiracy againft the Lacedaemonians that held their Town; meaning to open their Gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and flain: excepting a very few, that efcafed out of the Town. The fums of this Commotion, caufed the Army to march apiece toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no fir within the Walls.

the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Tim then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedæmon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readines an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Country, but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted Slaves, Malefactors, and base Peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt: and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an Assembly: and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous Treason: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withal) the mildest course, to arrest before hand and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own Person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cries and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to Prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrify the People; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal Crime to be suspected? and to the same purpose, his cruelty extended it self unto some poor wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to fly to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the Streets, and slain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens; He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a sally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Soldiers of the Town had the better at first; but were at length repelled with loss. Tim abode not many days before Sparta: but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to Battle. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodiens, laid Siege unto Gyrtium, the only or principal Haven-town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by Treason. There were two Governours within the Town, equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithful, sue the Traitor; after whose death, he himself alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintus with part of his Army came thither to Gyrtium; this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Tim or his Master might do for him, but was contented to give up the place; yet upon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and Brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, soldiers Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seem) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gyrtium: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they finding that it was lost: then began they to think upon his death the War, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent Embassador to Tim: requesting only, that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parley the Tyrant speak very reasonably for himself: proving, that he suffered wrong and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the sum was, That whatsoever they now did, or could, object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred. That neither for his keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make War upon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoever, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintus was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyranny; and gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should be alledged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyn with Philip, when he was their Enemy, not only in League, but also in affinity: and That his Fleet had robbed many of their Ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, since in the Articles by Tim propounded unto Nabis there was no restitution mentioned, other than of Ships by him taken from the Greeks his Neighbours, with whom he had long held War: it may seem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the Volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it seems that Antiochus, the Praetor of the Acheans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting left the Romans, (that were wont to talk so much of their own justice, honour, and faithful dealing) should now relent, and forswear to molest him, who, though a wicked Man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong; framed his discourse to an other end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his own estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilst he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happiness, as private Men. Thus they discoursed until night. The next day Nabis was contented to requite Argos; and requested them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take Counsel with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, wherewith the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Army to lye in League all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make Peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Titus should think meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending;

Titus

Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonians to have ought to do in the Isle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor War, either in that Island, or elsewhere; nor to build any Town or Cattle upon his own Lands; nor to keep any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred Talents in Silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty Talents yearly, for Eight years next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded Five Hostages, such as he himself should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants own Son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the War from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himself did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to difference a little with the Roman Faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then should this Enterprize, when once it was taken in hand, have been prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the Spoil of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Tim: so did it minister unto the Atolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Maligner Romans, to hold any one of those Countries, or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous City among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had usurped it but yesterday: and he therein rooted by their authority, as their Friend and Confederate. Nabis, on the other side, thought himself unmercifully dealt withal, by the self-same Romans; whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful War, before the love and affinity of the Lacedæmonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But sally he dealt with the Macedonian: and sally was he dealt with by those to whom he did mistake himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Agésilas, the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child, was driven out by Lysurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them returned unto their City and Estates; but only leave required for as many of their Wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands: and sustained an assault or two, hoping belike, that the Enemies would soon be weary. But his fearful nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, he delivered the Hostages; and thereupon obtained Peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome, by the Senate and People. From this time forward, he thought the Romans more wicked than himself; and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all Mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard news, that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This excited them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them joyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Preferably after this came T. Quintus to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, wherewith the Citizens had laid hold, without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemean Games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Council of Achaia; whereby the Acheans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same Extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business, or none, wherewith to sit on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet; Scipio, the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The unfeigned meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way of confuting the Atolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it self, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: whereto he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of Estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsel; touching the moderate use of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Lastly, he gave up Aerocrinus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison; and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what liars the Atolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks testify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Country by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with as happy end: and by leaving the Country before his departure was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his virtue and benefits, untainted by jealousy and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, he had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three days together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the Spoils of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a Spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All sorts of Arms, with Statues, and curious pieces of Braſs or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first days Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the Treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Mass unwrought; some, in divers sorts of Coin; and some, in Vessels of fundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the Workmanship. Among these were Ten Shields, all of Silver, and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himself entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the Beasts for Sacrifice, the Prisoners, and the Hofages: among which, Demetrius, the Son of King Philip, and Armenes, the Son of Nabiz, were principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph, he procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintus, and the Ten that had been his Counsellors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said unto Titus, and his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor, and the vanquished; between those, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between those, that had lived always in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yield; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seem unreasonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usual to demand and make restitution, of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their own; and neither carry it self as superior unto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and Friendship that had been so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so, they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting, or not putting, his Garrison into them, as the Senate should think fit. Hereto Quintus answered, That since they went so distinctly to work, he would also do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to accept: Either that it should be lawful for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seek their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing; but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propound-

ed. For if the Romans might be hired to abstain from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampacae, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that fought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had been at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundations, and re-peopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been displaced, or captive to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans took upon them, as if their cause were far the superior. For it was, they said, their purpose to set at liberty those free Towns, which the King would oppress, and hold in subjection: especially since those Towns were of Greekish Blood and Language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Rome had afforded unto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many Subjects on the hither side of Ephesus. Neither did they forbear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning, not only to protect those which relied upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his Subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once again to send over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintus, and his associates, would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years, or thereabouts, to prepare for War, finding in the Romans, all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Malantius to the Carthaginians: that sue to the Romans for justice in aim.

THE Isabrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continual War upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal, and his brother Mago, departed thence, until such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations having lived under Mago, for Wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar, a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath been already shewed; by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone, but that their Companions, ha-hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallicia Cisalpine, now called Lumbarie; it hath been long since rehearsed, between the first and second Punic Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely, that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, before the greater employments which they had of sides the Arms abroad, their forces appointed unto their War had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that always made them to proceed warily, having an Eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying Ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Country was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of freight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken nor besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoil their Land. In these respects they served excellently well, to train up the Roman Soldiers to hardiness, and military patience; teaching them (besides other Exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their dure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borders, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custom, rather than by judgment: and to acknowledge no such virtue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them, and any of their neighbours, use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custom for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress; and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of Exercise unto the Romans; so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in Figure by some Geographers, unto an Ox-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus, the Indian, shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Emblem of his large Dominions. For, treading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not up in Rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred up to Arms; but had not much knowledge in the Art of War, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hindrance) and being divided into many small Signories, that had little or communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrows; as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking Arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their Wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Soldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Country; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their sure friends the Laines, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and wital too great, for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should always maintain sick Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold it in obedience and peace; and such headful Captains, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Country, though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the Forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts; and, together with rebellion by many Victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Country; which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War; yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a Battle with the Roman Proconsul, whom they flew; and had a great Confusion, that filled them with greater hopes. Yea the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither Two Praetors, and with each of them two Legions. These did somewhat; yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent into that Province; found at his coming little less to do, than the re-conquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: some were faithful to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chief of them, they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him to much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebel. He therefore disarmed them: which they took so heavily, that many of them flew themselves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding, that such disparagement might work dangerous effects; He called unto him the principal among them: and commending unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great loss. He prayed them to devise what course might be taken, for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject, He gave express charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw down the Walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carried the War about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Ciliberians, against other of their Countrymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest, That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, he could pay them with the Enemies Money. Finally he brought the War to go good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publick Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herin he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a Virtue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed, The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skillful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publick. Many Books he wrote: whereof the Principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Husbandry. In matter of Husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his subsistence; being of mean birth, and the first of his House. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from Bribes, and fastidiousness himself to the ancient laudable Customs of the City. Herin he had merited singular commendations; if the rehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the Virtue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other Worthy Men; that were no less honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise he was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions, as if he never were out of his Element. He loved business so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, he was excoriated in defending himself, or accusing others. For at the age of fourscore and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused Sergius Galba unto the People. So began the Nobility of Cato his Family; which ended in his great Grandchild M. Cato the Uticens: one, that being of like Verue and Fervency, had all his good purposes daft, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobility and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Country seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prators therefore, of which two every year were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into two Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a Battle: another took fifty Towns; and a third enforced many States of the Country to sue for Peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; yet so, that commonly there were of Men, Towns and People, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slain, taken or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I have already pointed: and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, until the Numantian War broke out; which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had Peace: but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the Enemies of the Barchine Houls promised all Felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Malcanilla fell to disputing with the Sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syria: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidians then challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out unto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Malcanilla himself, now very lately, pursuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to pass through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Malcanilla had wherewith to justify his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithless people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto them from Hannibal one, that should persuade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, upon some suspicion of his Errand; yesternight arresting him nor his Ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidians concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebel; and therefore good policy to keep them down. As for the Country of Emporia: it had always he said, been theirs; that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometimes unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were known: this the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title, unto any more ground, than that whereon their City stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than Strangers in Affrica, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small Thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compals, was purchased by fraud, and wrongful encroachments. This considered, Malcanilla requested of the Senate, That they would not adjudge unto such Usurpers, the Country sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured Friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would do nothing rashly; they sent over three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chief to decide the controvercie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely that Malcanilla with a strong Army should quickly prevail, against those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held not only from stirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little unto their final destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to express the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besieges Gytheum, and wastes some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopomen, in advantage of Ground: whereby he easily vanquishes Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, joins with the Ætolians. The Ætolians stirre Demetrias; and by killing Nabis their Confederate, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopomen his persuasions, annex themselves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at Peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole Spoil of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not only disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might have well sufficed them, if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had unfeatherable wrong. Wherefore they desired in a Parliament, which they shortly held, by what means they might best right themselves; and give the Romans a sorrowful knowledge of the difference, between their Enmity and Friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not only persuade Antiochus to make War upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to join all together in a new Confederacy: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood but far surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Ætolians took in hand: and well befecoming them, for they were great darters. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with persuasions as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other Courtes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet shewed himself of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seek any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege to Gytheum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Tim at his departure had commended the affairs of Peloponnesus, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his Duty: neither would they have stayed long from repressing his violence by open War; had not some of them thought it wisdom of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a business of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were advised by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them just cause of complaint, by waisting their own Territory.

Philopomen was then Prator of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Crete; making War there for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying until the Romans came; or doing otherwise, as he should think best. He made all haste to relieve Gytheum by Sea; fearing lest the Town, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopomen was so fast a Seaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admiral, that had fourscore years ago been counted a gallant Vessel, in the Navy of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonians. Only it fell out well, that he committed himself to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Talons. For his Admiral Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many Leaks, and took in Water so fast, that the was fain to yield without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admiral; all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopomen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation; He said that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the Siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans if they should invade his Country. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopomen came unexpected; fired their Camp; and put all save a very few of them to the sword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him; that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gytheum, with any any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marked therefore almost securely, in a long Troop reaching some five miles: having their Horse and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to bear off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take: appeared in the front of them with all his Army: encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custom of Philopemen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his Friends, to mark the situation of the Country about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, That having with them there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and forced in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountered by a greater Army, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what piece of ground it were meet for him to seize upon; and in what manner he might best do it? in what for he should order his Men? where bestow his Carriages; and under what Guard? in what fort encamp himself? and which way march the day following? By such continual meditation, he was grown to perfect, that he never met with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himself and his followers. At this time he made a stand: and having drawn up his Rere, he encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His Baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rock; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the ways bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; where the Achaean lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopemen understood this; and laid an Ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Prefently after this, he caused one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant, as a Fugitive, and tell him, that the Achaean had a purpose to get between him and Lacedaemon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People, to take Arms for the recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies he made to fly behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, whereby to conceal his departure. But Philopemen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Camp; and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The Enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopemen conceived aright, that their fear and necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and save themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day; He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedaemon. So Nabis his Men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopemen Camp great store of lights, thought that all had been at rest; and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopemen waste the Country round about; whilst Nabis durst not stir forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without Forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintus among them; labouring to make their Party strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be follietted by the Aetolians. Very fair countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever he thought, of good Correspondence. They promised to restore unto him his Son: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War against Antiochus in Greece: whilst their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage between Ptolemy and his Daughter, together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings Son, which happened during the Treaty, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giving audience in Person to the Embassadors; caused them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to pass during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning or (as Livy rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus, upon a causeless suspicion wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his Virtue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged unto himself. But Scipio who thought his own Title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? to whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my self. Now whether this were so or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbear a while to use his Council. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former Grace and Credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to swear at the Alars, when he was a little Boy, That he never should be Friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain fumes: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought upon War with Rome, so long would Hannibal do him all good service: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make Peace, then should it behove him to use the Council of some other Man.

The Aetolians, and their Friends, were no less busy all this while, in making their Party strong against the Romans: than were the Romans, in muffling up their Friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own own Forces; and arrogating to themselves the honour of the Victory against Philip; that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of Peace, unless he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He understood the Romans, and himself, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the utmost: as knowing, that all the Burthen must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without help from any; save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto they were contented, to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his Presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans: it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his Friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panathenium, or Great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the Enterprize which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign-field, on which, to the ruin of the Country, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Aetolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming 'the Stricklers'. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them and urge them to such violent courses, He willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the World in an uprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear those comfortable words, That by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of favour. For with such Terms had they been flattered once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who, having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This was only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the controversies depending between the Romans and Aetolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings mind before. Having made it; they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tiber. Gender words would have done better, as the Aetolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip in waiting for the authority of a general Assembly. The Apollon (so were the Privy Council of Aetolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the young heads could have done. They laid a Plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden: entering, some of them as Friends to conduct home a Principal man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintus, had been driven to fly thence, but was, by intercession of those that loved him, again recalled. His Aetolian companions that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had banished Man to bring home; but they came to strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it fell against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostility, they gave a gentle answer: saying, That they came not thither as Enemies, who more injuriously dominated over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By such Rhetoric they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Townsmen replied, that they neither found any abridgement of their Liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dashed. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good Friend, was Lord of the Town: styling himself King; but more truly, by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopemen had lately given him: since, he durst not stir abroad; and daily expected the mischief, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent Messengers, one after other, to the Aetolians: requesting them, that as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, that the ravenous Aetolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his Mercenary Forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedaemon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamennus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Demetrias the Prætor brought into the Council of the Apollon, where they were commanded to be no wiser, than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make War with the Achaean, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamennus should command them: which were it never to deperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexandrus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him, that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætoliens, He said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a Muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater Company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his Men, that had been long pent up in the City, and train them without the Walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his Men in the field; riding up and down with his Alexandrus, and no more than three or four Horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexandrus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætoliens, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirty Horse-men, and bade them remember the task enjoined them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished Men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Here- which the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexandrus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and thruck him down. The thirty Ætoliens never stood to deliberate upon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead Body: where instead of seeking revenge they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexandrus with his Ætoliens halted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens, who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was shortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children; whom they mounted upon a Good Horse, and made him their chief. So they fell upon the Ætoliens that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexandrus with not many of his Company, were slain in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as Bond-slaves. In this doubtful Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopemen came thither: who calling out chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexandrus should have done after he had slain the Tyrant; easily persuaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achaens. Thus by the enterprise, no less dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætoliens, and the small but effectual travel of Philopemen; the Achaens made a notable purchase: as Lacedæmon, that had hitherto been governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had scarce any reputation when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

§. VII.

Antiochus, persuaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, he attended. *Sundry passages between him, the Ætoliens, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors, and the Ætoliens, with the Civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achaens. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace, between the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King of Aminander; and an idle civility, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal grows good Counsel in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King returns to Chalcis; Where he marries a young Wife, and reveals away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætoliens keeps the Streets of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.*

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampascus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet he was desirous with all speed convenient to shew himself in Greece; where he had been told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in Arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a Chain, desiring nothing more than to break loose; and that the Ætoliens, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatest, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilst therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africa, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care aside: for that his Countreimen had already taken Demetrius; a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his virtue and fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit Man to be employed in the Kings forerun, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, that the King should as greatly greatly feel the loss of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander if his fortunes were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner quality: whereas nevertheless if Hannibal prevailed; Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warrior should be always near unto the Kings Person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the Sovereign Command; even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the virtue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pomp of Ceremony, he went up from the Seaside to Ilium; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Trôys. Thence passing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrius. Euarchus the Magnesian, the same whom by that pretext they waited on home, when by that pretext they were now the chief Man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreimen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this; and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnesian found not the like cause of joy. For whereas he had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred Ships, of which no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars; with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and six Elephants. The Ætoliens no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would do so; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætoliens gave him as joyful entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Council, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he said, in true estimation a sign of his good will; in that he staid not to make all things ready; but halted unto their aid, even whilst the season was unfit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, travel, or danger, to follow the business which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the Ætoliens therein the chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be at way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessities; that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals, whereof he flood in need. So he left them to their consideration: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yield unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a business of dangerous importance, upon the promised assistance of a State that is merely popular. For the vehemency of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council: the Ætoliens, for gain of two or three Towns, yea for hope of such gain that might have deceived them; were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoas, and complained of the wrong; but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked Men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætoliens. He was chosen General of all their forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilst it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrius. With these he halted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætoliens, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chief Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætoliens began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance for Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and useful, they said would never be obtained; until by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every several Estate had where to find redress of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, to join with him in League; as that if either the Romans or He should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redress at other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they spoke of themselves, they could likewise affirm of all the Greeks: inasmuch as none of them paid any Tribute; was kept under, by any Garrison; or lived otherwise than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himself, to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Ætoliens, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætoliens, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such estate as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, when strong enough, to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yield, before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus girt; all the rest of the Island, shortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Soldiers, that came over-late to have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Town of Bœotia, lying over against the Island; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seen, whilst others were busied as they found cause; without fear of any danger; as being in such a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Messippus, one of Antiochus's Captains, that had wearied himself in many vain Treaties of Peace; took advantage of their carelessness, and used them with all extremity of War. Very few of them escaped: fifty were taken; and the rest slain. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause, than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should persuade very many to take his part. The wisest returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referred themselves until he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not daring to stir; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their just fear, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay far off, joyined with him in true meaning; save the Eleians, that always favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Æcheans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Æcheans to his party. Nevertheless he assayed them, upon a vain hope that the envy, which Titus was said to bear unto Philip's virtue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both He and the Æcheans sent Embassadors to the Council at Ægium; that spared not brave words, if the Æcheans would have so been taken. The Kings, Embassador told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming: reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, E-lonians, and Cadusians; names that were not every day heard of; and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable Men at Sea, the Sydaniens, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning Money, and all Warlike furniture; it was, he said, well known, that the Kingdoms of Asia had always thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived; who considering the late War made against Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too far different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Æcheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilst He took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassador; and further added, That in the Battle at Cyncephala, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Soldiers; but that both He and his Army had been there destroyed, had they not been protected by virtue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Council, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have been desired. He told the Æcheans, That neither the Kings' Embassador, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to persuade those unto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even such brags as here they made, before the Æcheans, who knew them to be liars, had the Ætolians also made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory over Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they been flattered by the King, with such tales as his Embassador told even now: of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a Many others; that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diverse names of rascal People were, he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no fish vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that variety, wherewith he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many pieces of one tame Swine, drest after several fashions with variety of Sauces. Seeing therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp; it were good to make judgment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noise, no more than ten thousand Men about him: for which little Army he was fain, in a manner, to beg Victuals of the Ætolians; and take up Money at usury, to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias again. These were the fruits of lies; wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser Men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much persuasion is needless. The Æcheans did not love so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece; but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the vilest objects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred between these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at rest: there was nothing more greedily to have been desired, than that they might never find occasion to return with an Army thither again. And in this respect ought the Greeks to have fought, not how Smyrna and Lampsaen might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers on the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Country, as two Seas by an Isthmus or neck of land, might be kept from overflowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greeks; than the general applause wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer.

Yet were Lyfimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take Arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising joyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Æcheans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Besaliens, were first against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his Enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Besians willingly received him, as soon as he entered upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans; by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Aminander, the Albanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Aradian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two Sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his Sifter to the poor Court of Albanania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedigree; he was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander, his forefather; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himself, or of his Sifter, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own Phrenzy, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his Subjects; or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to do good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading; with which he marched unto Cyncephala, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians: whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended mischief unto his delight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready, with all his power, to aid them whereinsoever they should be pleased to use him.

The Ætolians, Magnetics, Eubœans, Besians, and Albanians, having now all joyined with him; Antiochus took counsel of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade

Italy; or whether to let all alone until the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his own Sentence, with the weightiest Reasons which he could allege; as in a meeting of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting; who had long been cast aside, as a Vessel of no use; but was now required to deliver his Opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even his counsel at any time before been spoken, had he any counsel at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetics, Besians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poor Efflates, that, wanting force of their own, did adjoin themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alleging the same fear for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behovel, to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoil and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper Forces. Now that Philip might be easily persuaded to join with them; the benefit likewise to redound unto himself, by their Society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of his hope? For, said he, These Ætolians here present; and namely this Thoas, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Mirours which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, inspired mainly on the same point. He told us, that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some Wild Beast, that was chained, or locks up within some Grate, and would fain break loose. If this be so, let us break his Chain, and pull down the Gate; that he may regain his liberty, and satisfy his angry stomach, upon those that are common Enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation; then shall it becom us to lock unto him, that he may not seek to please his good Masters the Romans, by offending us. Your Son Selencus, is now at Lyfimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Macedon, let Selencus be in readiness, to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend. His sons on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great Enterprise, wherein you are now embroiled against the Romans; I told you my Opinion at the beginning. Whereby I told you my Opinion at the beginning. Whereby I told you then grown ear; as the Romans by this time should have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy and Gauls should have been on fire with War; and little to their comfort, if they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for your Fleet, and Army either (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of Victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Wherof let the one half be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other half, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the Affairs of Greece, and therewithal make countenance, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice: who though perhaps I am not very skillful in all sorts of War; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine own. Of this counsel which I give, I promise you my faithful and diligent service for the execution; but what counsel forever you shall please to follow; I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great Spirit of the man, and said, he had spoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the mean while they were in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the Walls with his whole Army. For their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedonia, professed himself Enemy unto Antiochus: where by the fame of the succour coming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many Fires on the Mountains tops afar off, thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excusing himself by the time of the year; he brake up his Siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Town: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, he shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captains followed his Example; and the Soldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the Field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of Discipline his Army had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looseness of Nuptial Revels; by setting them to harder Exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The War against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise he was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: unto whom was fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punick War, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very fear and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertain an old stone, which the Devil then taught them to call the Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Virtue, or good Opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province; or arrogate more unto himself, than his lot should afford him. This impartial distribution of Employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make War against the Beijans: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, though so glorious as was that of his Colleague; nothing purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and sixteen Elephants. Ptolemy, King of Egypt, withdrawing his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip, King of Macedonia, had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his Forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolemy sent also Gold and Silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young, and dwelt too far off. So his Money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philip's Embassadors answer was made, That this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholden to him, for the assistance that he should give to Acilius the Consul. M. Acilius likewise, and the Carthaginians, did drive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of Grain; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein M. Acilius far outwent the poor City of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to let out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-money, which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly Penfions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hafty and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noise and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, between the Roman and the Asiatic Soldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their Excuse, when they should again forsake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; he was glad to withdraw himself. Aminander fled out of his Attabania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the Brother of Aminander's Wife, was taken by the Consul; made a Mocking-stock; and sent away Prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them flaid behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who having withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his friends: and said, That he had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toil during one half of a Winter, and spent the other half in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promises of the Ætolians mostly verbal; and himself reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yet a very Prophet, that had foreseen all their Forces: as considering their own need no less than his. But the Ætolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to do great wonders, was in all this while followed by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the fame ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyed with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thas and his fellows had done their best, in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized upon the Streights of Thermopylae: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, until more help should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath been spoken enough before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to pass that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece: unless they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three days together, against a World of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great Miracles, and effect what he listed himself in Greece: did commit himself unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilst he lay, he sent earnest Maffages one after other to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at leastwise now to help, and keep the tops of the Mountains, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come down upon them. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which only, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the Streights: without flaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. *Percin*us Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himself encouraged his Army: not only by telling them of what safe-conditioned Enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were Victors. This was on the day before the Battle. All that night Cato had a fore-journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skillful Guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing up slippery Rocks, and crooked ways: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a fair way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any Travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though if were the best; yet did it lead him to a Bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he staid there until day light: by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him; and some of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service; and willed them by any means to get him some Prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently fell upon the Ætolians; overthrew them; slew a great part of them; and chased the rest: that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The Fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them from their Camp, found it in a manner a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp it self; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pike, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and poured down a shower of Weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman Arms and Ensigns were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsook the Camp, and fled. The Slaughter was not great: for that the badness of the way, did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this days loss drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their Gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of Suppliants. Briefly, in few days all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any respite. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyn with him against Antiochus: over whom, since the Victory was already gotten, He did gratefully unto the Romans their good success; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard; especially Philip, who fain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Mine, were overwhelmed by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the Spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Here with Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antiochus, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himself; until such time as another Consul, was ready to ease him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire Peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight; entreating him not to for-

forfake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with Money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a sum of Money, that might serve to defray the charges of the War: promising, that ere long he would fend them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thous, another of their Embassadors, he retained with him; who willingly staid, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope, of amending their fortune by the help of Anticlus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain Peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience; but said, He had other business in hand: only He granted them Ten days of Truce; and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata; they began, as men favouring their own cause, to allege how well they had deserved of the Romans. Where Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the Malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to intreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the Faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This Phrase of committing unto the Faith; signified, in their use of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a Fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yielding to discretion.

Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said He, I command you first of all, That none of ye presume to go into Asia, upon any business, private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicaarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epheir, Ammendar the Abthamanian, and such of his Countrymen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilft he was yet speaking, Phameas, the Embassador, interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custom of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his Faith; nor unto Slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custom with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a Chain. With that, Chains were brought; and an Iron Collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb, and knew not what to say. But Valerius, and some others, intreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himself: and said, That neither He, nor yet the Apoleis, or ordinary Council of the Nation, were able to fulfil these injunctions; without approbation of the general Assembly. For which cause He intreated yet further Ten days respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This Surceance of War, during Ten and other Ten days together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia; that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in Employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him, in the continuance of this War: He was desired to set upon the Abthamanians, and some other petty Nations, their borderers, whilft the Consul was busied with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And He got in that space all Abthamanian, Perthebian, Apertanian, &c. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War; yet they could not endure to hear more talk of peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come back from Anticlus, with Money, and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles; and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His Money Nicanor conveyed into Lamia, by very unusual dexterity. But he himself being to pass further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassy, was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his Servants to intreat Nicanor friendly: and he himself being then at Supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up; giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madness; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance, first with the Romans, and then with King Anticlus: but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had never made any trial: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signify unto his Countrymen; and privately to hold in mind the courtesy which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convey to guard him to Hypata. He lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was always after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon: so as in the War of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans; and therefore was laid away to Rome; where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it; he forthwith meant to prosecute the War against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make Head against him at Naupactus: whether he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The Siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had pre-conceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Anticlus stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So he staid there well-near all the following time of his Consulship; whilft the Macedonian King, and the Ætolians, made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Anticlus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrias; and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Abthamanians and others. The Æthians called to account the Elens and Messenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it in taking part with Anticlus. The Elens gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians, being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help, when the Ætolian Pursuer waisted their Country, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Time was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandment, their Gates should be opened; but that unto the Æthians it was not their meaning to yield. A Message from Titus to the Æthian Prætor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War: as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Æthians; and become part of their Common-wealth. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Embassador. Titus did favour the Æthians; yet could not like it well, that either they, or any other, should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Isle of Zacynthus, which had once been Philip's, and was afterward given by him to Ammendar, who sent a Governour thither. But when Ammendar in this present War, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip: then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Æthians; whom he found ready Champions. Titus liked not of this; but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies, as a reward of the Victory which they had obtained. It was bootless to dispute. Wherefore the Æthians referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, That their Common-wealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Poloponnesus was the shell; and that holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having felled things thus in Poloponnesus, He went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio, the Consul, had lain Two Months; that might have been far better spent. There, whether out of compassion which He had upon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philip's driving fo fast: He perswaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians have made such earnest suit, as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been fure to carry it, in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; since the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome, no intreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor War with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much Money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withal, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what Points, and how far forth, they should yield unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as Enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilft the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of Peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece; and therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable Æthians. He would have had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Elens into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Æthians liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they desired the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer Grace. As for the Elens, they were loth to be beholden to the Romans; and thereby to disparage the Æthians: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted; and saw that they should have their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admiral, C. Livius, much about the same time, fought a Battle at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Anticlus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty Sail of Rhodiens came after the battle, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of Sail: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger, as soon as he betook himself to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first years War, between King Anticlus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuse themselves by fear; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained Pardon. On the contrary side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-Enemy of late unto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored unto him Demetrias, his younger Son; whom some few years they had kept as an Hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard He desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Army, as soon as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to use it, should not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the Son-in-law of King Anticlus: but he was the Friend of Fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The same did Anticlus now begin to

to suspect, who had thought himself a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had been in another World: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt, but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a batrel for his Kingdom.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius, the African, his Elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants leave to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by Sea; and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom; with the Siege of Pergamus, raised by an Army of the Achaïans. L. Scipio, the Consul, comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desires Peace, and is denied it. The Battle of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being conquerd, yields to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the Peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is furnished The Asiaticque, at his Brother was fitted The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the Brother of P. Scipio, was chosen Consul for Rome, with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate; and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable Employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his Brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an unblamable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio, the African, said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his Brother to the War against Antiochus, He himself would follow his Brother in that War, as his Lieutenant. These Words were heard with such approbation, that the controversy was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had been victorious against the same great Worthy. But indeed a worse man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his Willdom was much approved, but his liberty and high Spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a sign of the freedom that he used in his censures, even whilst he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Army in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had been served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly Furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well-pleasing himself with that goodly Spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans? Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost upon the backs of Cowardly Asiaticques, was no better than a Spoil to animate good Soldiers. How little this answer pleased the King; it is easy to guess. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the Man, caused him to lose the use of his Service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Soldiers newly prest to the War, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of Thirty Quinqueres Gallies, and Twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was chosen Admiral the same year for that Voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa, a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied Peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which headlessly, as in a time of confusion, they had left ungarded the last year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden, was carried at the second assault. Thence went He to Amphissa; which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his Successor, came with thirteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Cattle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians; increasing him to stand their Friend, and help them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of Peace. He gave them gentle words: and would them to persuade the Ætolians, that they should faithfully, and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many Messings passing to and fro; though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from War: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time should afford. So they obtained half a years Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another half years leisure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than P. Scipio; who thought all time lost, which withheld the War from passing over into Asia.

The business of Ætolia being thus laid aside: and the old Consul, Glabrio, sent home into Italy: the Scipio's marched into Thessaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace, unto the Hellepont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyalty of King Philip, who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would be unfaithful, though he were not so courageous; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of Victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disagreeably forced to return. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: where-in, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some trial; by causing a Gentleman to ride hide Post unto him, and observe his doings, as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a Feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he lovingly bad welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of Victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made Bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to pass. With these good news Gracchus returned back in haste unto the Scipio's: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readiness, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally; and brought them on their way, even to the Hellepont; where they staid a good while, until their Navy was in readiness to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian; true to the King, and desirous of revenge upon his Countrymen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea; thought to do somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work; and sent word, as in great secrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral, That if the Sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew so careless, expecting still, when he should receive a Watch-word from Polyxenidas, that he himself was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for fear of being discovered, kept one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Haven. Paussanatus the Rhodian Admiral, seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his Men on the two Head-lands, or points of the Haven; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himself by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies, in another part of the Island: which falling upon the back of Paussanatus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his Men aboard. This could not be without great confusion; so as the Enemies took him out of all order; and sunk or boarded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a sudden device made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset upon two poles, at the Beak-head: and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemy: who having not be thought himself what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto these desperate Gallies; for fear lest they should burn, together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Nor long after this, the Romans had some loss by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, He was driven back again by the like foul Weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, for forth Twenty other Gallies: the Romans also, with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, presented batrel to Polyxenidas, before the Haven of Ephesus. When he durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were intreated by the Rhodians, or persuaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by storms at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes, with his Fleet, was compelled to forsake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waited all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Seleucus, to besiege the Royal City of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Army spoil the whole Country thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having, with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaïans, old Soldiers all, and trained up under Philopemen, whose Scholar, in the Art of War, Diophanes, whose Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding the Walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanor of the Enemy; began to disdain, that such men as they should hold him besieged. For Seleucus his Army, which was encamped at the Hill-foot, facing thar none durst fall forth upon them, grew so careless; as otherwise, than by spoiling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Country. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus; and told him, that he would go forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the Match was nothing equal. But the Achaïans would needs have his will: and if suing forth, encamped not far from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himself quiet, they made a jest of his boldness; and laughed to see with what handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his Men to follow him, even as fast as they well might: and he himself, with the Hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden upon the Station that was next at hand. Very few of the Enemies had their Horses ready saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drave them all out of their Camp; and chased them as far as he might safely adventure, with great slaughter of them, and no loss of his own. Here at all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the Walls of the Town, Men and Women, to behold this Spectacle) were very joyful; and highly magnified the virtue of these Achaïans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their Gates, to help the Achaïans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a Mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had staid many hours, looking who should begin; Seleucus, in fair order, as he came, withdrew himself toward his lodging, that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilst the Enemy was in sight: but as soon as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all haste; and soon overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rear; so as he brake them, and with all his Forces, purified them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Achaïans, and the boldness of his own men, caused Seleucus to quit the Siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of those Asiaticques, Philopemen had cause to tell the Romans; That he envied their Victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis, after his Marriage, and his Soldiers beheld themselves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great fecundity: a good man as they were tripping in their Victualing-houses; which Philopomen said that he would have done, had he been General of the Achaens, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almost nothing to pass. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself, with a few of his Horse, and light Armature. Before Pergamus he left his Son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elea: whither he heard that Emilius, the Roman Admiral, was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of Peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Emilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treaty brake off. Then followed the Overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the Siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns, of scarce any worth or note, were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty sail, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hamibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courteer of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a Retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions, which were but as Praefaces unto the War; the last and greatest was a Victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas, the Kings Admiral. The Battle was fought by Myrmecus, a Promontory in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year, That his Armada should cover all the Shoars of Greece. The Romans had Eight and Fifty Gallies: the Rhodians, Two and Twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light timbered, and thin plankt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which, five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samus. For with fire in their Prows they ran upon the Enemy: who declining them in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoisted Sail: and having a fair Wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet Forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof Thirteen were taken: all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans, and their fellows, lost only two or three Ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if he hope had been remaining, to defend those places that he held in Europe: He presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the besiegers (if the Siege had been continued obstinately) to terms of great extremity. He also gave over the Siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought, gave only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Antiochus, the Capadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not only came to the Hellepont; but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readiness, to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that He landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had been his already. The first news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Ambassador that came to sue for Peace. This the Ambassador declared in his Masters name. That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining Peace of the Romans heretofore, did now persuade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all Disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampachus, and Lysimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampachus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with War? If it was their desire, that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain; and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise bear half the Charges, wherewith they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insistent upon confidence of their fortune; He expected their answer. These offers which to the Ambassador seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the charges of the War, since it began through his only fault: and that he should not only depart out of those few Towns which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the left, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Ambassador therefore saw, that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of Gold, together with the free restitution of his Son; who (it is uncertain by what mischance) was taken Prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his Son, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publick business: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the War to take hold on his own Kingdom: there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no less, than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was, that he should fear to come to battle; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threethreescore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed With Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to hear that the Consul drew near him apace, as one halting to fight. But howsoever he was affected; He made to little show of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elea, He sent thither unto him his Son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withal not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, that herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of Wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courteous before the Battle, as would afterwards have been little worth: than to stay until the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recovery of his Son: so as the joy thereof was thought, to have been much available unto his Health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He laid only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable present, I am now able to make your King more other amends, than by advising him not to fight, until he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his Counsel: and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygians or Hylus, unto Adanessia by Sipylus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and a thousand of within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some loss driven back over the River. Two days were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would pass the Water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps did guard repelled. Four days together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came the half way forward, and presented Battle; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Country of their Friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would stain their Honour by returning far back, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the War until the next Spring. The Roman Soldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Crie, that this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were so many Beasts to be slaughtered, than Men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loath to displease his Men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy; resolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the Field again, and ordered their Battels: He also did the like; and advanced so far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latin: in each of which were five thousand and four hundred Men. The Latins, as usually, were in the points; the Romans in the main Battel. All of them, according to their wonted Form, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: as was usual; and last of all, the Triarii. Now besides these, there were of three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achaens; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal front beyond the Latins in the right Wing. Umoft of all (save some five hundred Cretans, and of the Trallians were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left Wing was fenced by the Bank of the River: yet four Troops of Horse were placed there; though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: so much as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men: as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more courageous Beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the several kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible Shew. On the right hand there were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barb'd Horse; and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse called the Agema, that were all Mediterranean, the choice of the Country, and accompanied by some others. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoining to these were fifteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand was the Kings own Regiment: called the Argyropides or Silver-shielded, by a name borrowed from their Furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name that had served under Great Alexander: then twelve hundred Archers on Horseback, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cretans, and Elymaens. On the left hand of the Phalangiers were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks and Barb'd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Antiochus, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations, and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troop, being Syrian, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the the Dromedaries, whereon the Arabians with long Rapiers that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymians, and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himself commanded in the right Wing: Selenus in the left: and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first order was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrify the Horse; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shoutings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the Field; and running back upon their own men, did the same harm, which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing: where they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shameful to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seem credible: that the Phalangiers, with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left Wing of his own Batall: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him weakly flanked with Horse; gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, lifted forth with all his power to help his Fellows: and, what by persécution, what by threats, made them renew the Fight. Succour also came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already Victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; he not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tardiance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this Batall fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardis, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Selenus was gone thither before him. He left the custody of Sardis, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Towns-men and Soldiers were so dismayed with the greatness of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts, without expecting Summons, yielded up themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many days spent ere Antiochus his Embassador was in the Camp: having none other Errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother; who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side of Taurus. For their charges in that War they required fifteen thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the Peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve years next ensuing by even Portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corn, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty Hostages which they required, very earnestly they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might so easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principal demands; as no great art was needful to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Velleus. The Ætolians desiring Peace, but could not obtain it; because they would except neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, that one of the Consuls should make War upon the Ætolians, the other upon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly these came news, that Antiochus was already vanquished in Batall, and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands; yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodiens and some other: yea by King Eumenes in Person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the business in hand. Concerning the Peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disposition: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts: and comparing himself with Maianissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him than they had been to the Numidians, since they had found him a King indeed; whereas Maianissa was only such in Title; and since both he and his Father had always been their Friends, even in the worst of the Roman Fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their censure; and they desiring by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greek Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to mind, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alleged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfy the desires of all their Friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away to much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such

Such end had the War against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld unto that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given to P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the Title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no less deserved; though the virtue requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; by the Books of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Dico Sango. The Ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's. Of the beginning of Faction among the Roman Nobility.

M. Arc. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty; it was now to be brought unto more lowly Terms than any other of the Greeks. The best way was, that so great a storm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied Peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedy; which was, to entreat the Rhodiens and Antiochus to become intercessors for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions; that they could not well devise, upon helping themselves, even by re-purchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in Exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Asiaticians (besides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of Command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their service toward his restitution. At the first there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the Multitude, four the chief Towns in the Country, to his use. The fame of this good success at first with Letters running from place to place, where by men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action: made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few days; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behind him, and so came to Antiochus, a little Asiatican Castle that fill was his, as being on the Frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argibæa, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldness to descend upon Argibæa: for that they might perceive the Asiaticians, all along the Hill sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busied. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe Retreat; especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back from Argibæa, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own Borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet, at their pleasure. The Asiaticians and Ætolians way-layed them, and pursued them so closely, that their Retreat was in manner of a plain Flight, with great loss of Men and Arms; few of those escaping that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, until Philip his return.

The Ætolians, having found the business of Asiaticania too case, made attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphibolians and Apertanians. These had belonged to their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolian again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonians, and so did still purpose to continue. These took Arms at first: but soon layd them away; seeing their Neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian Quarrel, and seeing their own King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of these Victories the joy was the less; for that news came of Antiochus his last Overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his hasting with an Army into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despite, that he had recovered his own from Philip, with such help as he could get. Neither seems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharp Correctors, nor earnest Reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the business, about which he came, and layd siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief Seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unless they would adventure to fight upon equal Ground. To help the Ambraciens, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were at the same time, vexed by the Egyptians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conquest, by Perseus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphibolians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with so many at once; and therefore earnestly sought Peace with the Romans, as they thought made head against the rest. In the mean while, the Athenians and Rhodiens Embassadors came; who brought the Consul to grant them Peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified.

by any violence of the assailants, or danger that might tend to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend half his time about one City, and to be driven to leave unto his successor the honour of finishing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and had them seek Peace with faithful intent; considering with how great a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Antiochus, offering his Service as a mediator, to put himself into Ambracia, and try what good his persuasions might do with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grievous to the weaker, but not un-sufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodesians accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needful in this intercession, for that Philip had made very grievous complaint about the loss of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the Peace, which those good Mediators of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicit. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them less free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any People of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Country. The Isle of Cephalonia was taken from them by the Romans; who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by stiffly pressing their own right) that if they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claim, there was set down an Order for perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of the controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedonia and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time War in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victory, his acts were the confirmation. He visited those Countries on the higher side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Wars, without regard of the great alteration happened in Asia. From every of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an Errand. He was even laden with booty, when, having fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long dominated over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their forefathers' acts, than any present virtue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to know themselves far the worse Men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Helys, in an Inland Country, where those Enemies were not like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield:

then was no Counsel thought to good, as to forsake their Houses and Country, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Maryana. These Mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the natural strength being helped, by such fortification as promised greatest assistance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, when he had staid there a while, Winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with casting Weapons, as if the Stones would have served well enough to that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Arms, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of Stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their Stones before hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, other than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive Arms, could not hold out against the Arrows and Weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of Ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had no other way left, than to cast themselves headlong down the steep Rocks. Few of the Men escaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and Goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of these Nations overcome soon after, at the other Mountain: as having fairer way at their backs.

These Wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconsul his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave Peace to those whom he had vanquished, as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as He thought expedient. He also did finish the league of Peace with Antiochus; whereto He swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, laden with spoil, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted, from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in Money alone, or Cattel, or things of needful use, which the Roman Souldiers had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous Household-stuff, and Slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians for Banquets; and, in a word, with the seeds of that luxury, which finally over-grew and choaked the Roman virtue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellspont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his Journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when Manlius came along with an huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry; seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, that afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdom, if the People of Rome had not made War in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Cilicia and Lycia to the Romans, in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility, to go to Rome and beg favours in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodesians had lately done. He had entertained longly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable Men in Rome: and was grown into near acquaintance with him by Letters, whereby he came himself acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Africa. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a finer way. For the Scipios had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself; yet himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joined with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thracians were by him led on, to assail the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advantages: and they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Army; whereof part had already passed a dangerous Wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting, and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though less dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradict-on: especially to Manlius; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax, as an unworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindered the Peace with Antiochus; Lit. l. 39, they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatened by Sibyls oracles, unto those that should pass the first Silvius. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyl Prophecy threatened the Roman, that should pass over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any loss, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemy King of Egypt; that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Ægyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tully noteth, scattered at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; Tit. l. 2, I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdom by Gabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers, have been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that Prophecy. Of the Sibyls predictions I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think, few Men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgment of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Cajaubus upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those Prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ is plainly was foretold, but even the Books of Hermes, Tit. l. 2, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosever devised them) by the undiscerned zeal of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with foreign proofs. And in the same rank, I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from English, no mean Authors. Of the honour which was English, done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an Inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publick, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought, that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am per-

swaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisms, taken amiss in place of Simoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many ages before been consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sango, in whose Chappel they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman Letters, or by some spoil that Time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to pass, that the words should be misread, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sango; thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, which entertain without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, the fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it can not be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the riches, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those Monies, which the Commonwealth had borrowed from private Men, in the second Panick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even as long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into judgment, by two Tribunes of the People; Men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy Men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great train of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the same day of the year he had fought a great Battle with Hannibal, and finished the Panick War by a signal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter and the rest of the Gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty business of the Commonwealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seveneenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the People, even the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio: leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own Slaves and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgment, until for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgraceful trial: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankful Romans; that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Literum; quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the same year, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his private behaviour at Literum, render it probable, that he outlived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Africanus. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching Money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prators, to inquire, and judicially determine, thereof. In favour of this Decree an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed Author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a Man of great, but not perfect, virtue: temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugal also, both of the publick, and of his own; so as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconformable, in seeking to encrease his own wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poisoned with envy, troubled both himself, and the whole City, whilst he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility: especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at fish as were of his own rank, Men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrius, his Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Consolship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some Vessels of Gold and Silver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's grew partly (besides his general spite at the Nobility) from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some check, that was given unto himself, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (Judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgment thinking unworthy of the virtue that was far above him, Cato killed Rome with untrue reports against his General; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the Author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their Enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio, his Brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgment being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of Money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should have been layed up in Prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred friends, and clients made such a collection for him, as would have set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than such of his own goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the civil War of the Tongues, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable, until now, since the Panick War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whose virtue Rome was indebted, for changing into too great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude; in such quarrelsome business, grew to perfection, they that found themselves over-matched by their adversaries, at this kind of Weapon, began to make opposition, first with Clubs and Stones, afterward with Swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the Streets, unto Battle in the open Field. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare virtue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two Sons, whilst they were but young, slaughtered in Rome together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonwealth receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen Enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But at the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular Man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captain of arms, was to be condemned, who by force of Arms returned into the City, and murdered all the principal Senators: whereupon began the civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a Man of higher spirit, to affect and obtain the like Sovereign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never a ny Consul had finally cause to rejoice, of his having put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in passing their Laws, by hurling of Stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Sovereign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voices in the House, did compel Cæsar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by Arms: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans confirming all or most of their principal Citizens, lost their own freedom, and became Subjects unto the arbitrary Government of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto complete greatness, nor believed of her self as if she had, whilst a King late Crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confirmation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian War.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being unready for War, obtains Peace at Rome; by his Son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

After the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonwealth of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publick declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute Vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Privileges belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, To beat Monies; and To reserve (as the French call it) the de-most report, or the last Appeal, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeal, or last resort, as even petty injury offered to each other by the forty named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Commonwealth, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining; yet so, as neither their Laws were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magistrats free, as that they had not therein especial regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the several Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skillful in the art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindful of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to use his own even as he listed, until they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his own high deserts) were they very loving unto Macedonia, and to his House, until Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion fettered in Africa: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding People in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were useful and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and showed himself not forgetful of his own former greatness, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the ways for them, and furnished them both with Victuals, and other things needful, to transport them over the Helle-spont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: in which Province * Hist. It is said, That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found, in the age of our Grandfathers, some, like, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his Estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of War, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraneus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gangetes, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heaps of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius, and his Successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gangetes being over-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their liberty: and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to find their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischief commonly done by these King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies, by shutting up the ways, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdom; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own Estate: yet inasmuch as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætoliens, of wrongful usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer, That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who, as soon as he thence withdrew his Men, did seize upon the Town, and ruin it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were Places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him, in the dispute about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their own title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Country therabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former War; and since they, by their victory had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at liberty, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Cœrœne, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every Controversy. Nevertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintain his right unto these Towns, wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the War against Antiochus and the Ætoliens: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruins of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruins Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at least

wife to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Macedonians had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, he took counsel of his own hand; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Macedonians in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of War. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could have been feared of these Proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himself, and laid it even upon the Macedonians; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, some to Eumenes, had fallen into such an outrage, that they had cut one another's Throats. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to inquire, among the Macedonians themselves: as well knowing, that they who survived were either his own Friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, that if he would discharge himself of the Crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his Spirits, and said that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requested them not to press him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to give away his Friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no Tales; he took order to have him poisoned by the way. By this we see, That the Doctrine, which Machiavel taught unto Cæsar Borgia, to employ men in mischievous Actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischief; was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us Examples of this goodly Policy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Lesson to the more ancient: as the Reign of Henry the Eighth here in England, can bear good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himself had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the War which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate: giving him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints; and willed to deliver his own grievances, in such wise that if ought were amiss, yet might it appear that he had been wrongfully urged to take such courses. The Sum of his Embassy was, to pacify the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himself was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevail somewhat; were it only in regard that would be born unto his Person.

Whilst this business with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readiness to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himself some other way the Roman Arms: the same Embassadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their Progress through the rest of Greece; and took notice of the controversies, which they found between some Estates in the Country. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Ætoliens. It was objected unto the Ætoliens, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City: as also further, in changing the Laws, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Praetor of the Ætoliens, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame upon others: the Ætoliens having only called those unto judgment, that were supposed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these Plaintiffs having slain them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing down the Walls of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, having persuaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper Virtue, did inhibit unto them all kinds of Fortifications; as the Retreats and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he showed, how the same Tyrants that had built these Walls, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his Ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawless Will. As for the Ætoliens, they communicated their own Laws, which they held to be the best, or else would have changed them and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians: whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of Policy. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embassadors, That he and his Countrymen held it strange, being Friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer to the account of their actions, as Vassals and slaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty; why might not the Ætoliens as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did budge themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand upon their greatness, and intimate, as they began, that the liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratify it: then must the Ætoliens have recourse unto those Agreements, that were confirmed by Oath, and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more the Immortal Gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking State upon him, he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, That if the Ætoliens would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mil-

* Hist. It is said, That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found, in the age of our Grandfathers, some, like, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and chief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which provoked to hear the Lordly Words of Appius. Yet Fear prevailed above Indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all Judgments of death or Banishment, that had been laid by the Acheans upon any Citizen of Lacedaemon; as likewise they made it a matter of dishonour, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedaemon, should be suffered to continue a Member of the Achean Commonwealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had been, an Estate by itself. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Council of Achaia, they discovered no less, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Acheans, than the Power which they bare over them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good Council and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private Passions, and neighbouring Hatred, which had evermore bought Revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the Honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearful Servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his Subjection had made his implacable Enemies) in hearty affection all the Country would be his, whenever he should take Arms, as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired Ratification of Peace; though qualified with much indignity following. He had been lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of Objectors, whereof his youth, unskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to read such brief Notes as he had received from his Father, and out of those, the Senate were contented to gather Satisfaction; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodness in the defence. Such Fride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreaty of his Son, together with some insolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred unto Rome, and bred in him a jealousy of his too forward Son. To let him forward in these Passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome; some bringing one Commandment; some another; and some requiring him to fulfil those things, which had been imposed upon him by their Fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance; and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius, was conversant; rather perhaps out of implicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder Son of the King, should not succeed unto his Father; but that the Diadem should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Perseus, but Philip himself; who suspected his younger Son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousy; it will not be amiss, to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

§. II.

The death of Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military Profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some Examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Acheans; that they seemed not unlikely to take part against them, in any Controversie that should be moved. Hereupon the Messinians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achean Commonwealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up again an Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City: who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpose, and not over strongly affected in the business, were careful to seek occasion of reducing things to such pass, that all their Citizens might be engaged in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to do some Acts of Hostility: whereby it was probable that Blood should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their Commotion and Proceedings; Philopemen, then Prator of the Acheans, loved such Forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many Principal Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readiness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Creta, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Demetrius, Captain of the Messinians; whom he charged and forced to run. But whilst his Horsemen were too earnest in following the Chase; there arrived by chance, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new Courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again; and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their aid, compelled Philopemen Horsemen to turn back. Philopemen himself had long been sick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatness of his Courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his Conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horsemen to pass along by him in a narrow Lane, he offered combat against the Messinians; whom his Reputation, and the knowledge of his great Worth, did terrify from approaching over-near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to the Ground by a fall of his Horse, and being withal in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet scarce believed their Fortune to be so good, although their Eyes were Witnesses. The first Messenger that brought this News to Messene, was so far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right Wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the Spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might satisfy themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his Virtue, and of the singular Benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good Will for his delivery. Contrariwise, Demetrius and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any disgrace or injury done to him unrevenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong Vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him down fast bound, and with an Engine laid him a heavy Stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his Enemies had concluded his present Death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him, with a Cup of Poyson, which Philopemen took in his Hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his mind, he said it was well: and so with a cheerful countenance, drank his last Draught. He was seventy years old, and weakened with long sickness, whereby the Poyson wrought the sooner, and easily took away his Life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their Flight, were marvelously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindful to preserve their own Lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilst they were devising what to do in such a case: They got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: So as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withal, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who coming thither and laying siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yield. Then Demetrius, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the Murder, were compelled to wait in Bonds upon the Aches of Philopemen, that were carried home in solemn Pomp to Megalopoli; where they were all of them slain at his Funeral, as Sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Marcius a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would have intermeddled in this business of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and kept him nothing to do. About the same time was T. Quintus Flaminius, sent Embassador to Prusias, King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the War against Eumenes, as to intreat him, that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spiteful Enemy in all the World unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did hereby descended: or rather (as Livy thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a Troop of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this, to suspect the Faith of Prusias, had devised some secret fallies under ground, to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his Enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and merciless hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous Enterprizes, his Honour, nor his Age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsel to resort unto, he took the poyson into his hand, which he always preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest Diseases of adverse Fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: *I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear, which hath so many years possess them; that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This Victory of Flaminius over me, which am disgraced, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbered among the rest of his heretical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how far the ancient Roman virtue is degenerated and corrupted. For such was the nobleness of their forefathers; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them Battel at their own doors, they gave him knowledge of the Treason intended against him by poyson: Whereat these of a latter Race have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their Counsels, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal Gods to revenge his infidelity, drank off the poyson, and died.*

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopemen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so fitly crosed by a cowardly and envious Faction at home; as his proper virtue, wanting public power to sustain it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the common misery of his Country and Commonwealth.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the Envy of our Equals, and jealousy of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonwealths. That there is no Protection more open oficious, than that of Men of War, and great Captains, being no Kings. For besides the Envy and Jealousy of Men; the Spoils, Rapes.

and tedious Journey unto them, that carried with them their Wives and Children : Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to pass. And thus he fought means to strengthen himself, with help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto him ; since he was not like to find assistance from any civil Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long ere they took effect : so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead ; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his Men to War, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wild People that bordered upon him, and stood worst affected to war him.

But these his Counsels and Proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own House. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meetest for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it self within words : he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived : which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindictive nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow : but imputed all to traitorous malice ; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needless. In his rage he caused many to die : among whom were some eminent Men ; and few or none of them deservedly. This encreased the hatred of the People, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general ; when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, until he should have massacred all the Children of those Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps he could have desired, gave Men cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not without vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own Children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make all nourish dissension between the Brethren, but only to cherish the virtue and towardsness of Demetrius : like as we find it in their History. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extreme jealousie in the Fathers head. If any custom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparel, or the unlighty contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jeered at in ordinary discourse and Table-talk, Demetrius was faine to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gave his Father cause to think, that he was no fit parastat of any counsel held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Perseus : who fearing so much left his Brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly, unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Perseus was then thirty years old ; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspicions, that were much encreased by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a slight occasion made the fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twain a Bitch ; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Army was to pass. This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons : after him came his own band, and they of his guard ; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Army was divided into two parts : which, under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight, using Poles, and the like, in stead of their Pikes and accustomed Weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the Victory : whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a tokening of their good success in a greater trial. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, until Perseus his side at length recoiled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad preface : but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort, who perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him ; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the Brethren was that day to feast his own companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what he did and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indifferently, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his Men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of Wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his Brother, and see what cheer he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his Brothers Men : yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them also to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good eapial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made known to Perseus : who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, as if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his House. Demetrius wondered to see himself excluded, and fared very angrily with his Brother. But Perseus, bidding him be gone as an Enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder Brother

Brother accused the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alleged, and in effect the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans ; by whom he knew that he should be defended and born out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him ; because he bore a due respect unto his Father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his Brother against him : as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the King himself : whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in fending Demetrius to Rome ; and that he should yet further do well to fend him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honorable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this Council was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should war upon his Brother to Rome ; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become servants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, and had such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them : bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in Wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent Brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bare him ; He said that it grew, if not from his own virtue, at leastwise from their Opinion thereof : so as by any impious practice, He were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to Fathers, Children, and Brethren ; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excess or Error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seem to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward, he gave himself over wholly to Perseus : using so little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to have him present, nor near unto him. Above all, he had especial care to learn out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Publicus and Apelles ; Men whom he thought no way interferred in the quarrels between the Brethren ; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they law the more in grace. These brought home with them a Letter, said to be written by Titus (whose Seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The Contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince ; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder Brother ; which yet should never take effect, for that Titus himself would not be Author, or abettor, of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly persuade the King, to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To strengthen him in this Opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custody, made shew as if he had pided the Estate of the unhappy Prince ; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he thortly discovered unto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to fly secretly to Rome ; where he might hope not only to live in safety, from his Father and Brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home, of bettering such claim as he had in reversion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas : who playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the escape, and in the mean while revealing the whole matter to the King. So Philip refused to put his Son to Death, without further experience of time. It was thought behoveful to make him away privately, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proof sufficient at least, of the Kings despite against them, if not of his meaning to renew the War. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accused Minister of his Kings unadvised Sentence, first gave poison to Demetrius ; which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Rusticks, to finish the Tragedy : who villainously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the Race of Antigonis there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own Blood. The Houses of Lyfimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their Heels, by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of Sovereign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almost been cut off the Lines of Ptolemy and of Seleucus : which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievously dis tempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart Family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised itself to marvelous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meer slavery : whereof a principal cause was, the Brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their Piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples ; but is said to have propounded the last of them, to his own Children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason to do so : not more in regard of the benefit which his Enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonis his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But He was himself of an unmerciful nature ; and therefore unmeet to be a good perfwader unto kindly affection. The murder by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his Blood-thirsty appetite he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his own ; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded Him with a draught of his own Poison. After the death of his Son, He too late began to examine the Crimes that had been objected ; and to weigh them in a more equal balance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole process. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he took, in being Znigamus, had left unto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsel. Wherefore he was justly punished; by feeling the difference between the imaginary happiness of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilst yet it was only drawing near, was forefigured unto Pericles, by Celidæus the Physician, who also foretold him, how he should be killed, and where abouts he should be killed. He was afterwards brought to the Court. So Pericles came thither on the sudden, and took possession of the Kingdom: which in fine he no less imprudently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

How the Baffaraze fill upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perſeus in the beginning of his Reign. Secret Wars of the Romans: and how they ſuffered, Malinſia, cruelly to oppreſs the Carthaginians. They quarrel with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make War without their leave obtained. The Treafon of Calliſtates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeeks friendſhip of the Achaeans, and is wiſelyoff by Calliſtates. The Romans diſcover their intent of Warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bassarani into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This compact was friendly observed, as long as none other was known than that Philip did live, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withal, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: it then was all dashed and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford to good Markets un- to these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bassarani would not be contented with reason, but became their own carvers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip: grew careless of thriving in the present with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows: and the Bassarani had the upper-hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their Voyage, I do not find. It seems that by the careless using of some victories, they drew loss upon themselves: and finally took that occasion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Pericles he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his Reign, to embroyle himself in a War so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the feeding of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himself, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for War or Peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion: he quickly took away the life of Antigenes. To win love of his People; he sate personally to hear their causes in judgment (though herein herein he was fo over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his virtue of Justice to be no better than fained; as also he gratified him with many delightful spectacles, magnificently by him far forth. Above all he had care to avoid all necessity of War with Rome; and therefore made it his first work, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the League; which he obtained, and was by the Senate flattered King and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his Neighbours; but was rather herein to excessively bountiful, that it may seem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became so griping and tedious. His fear was indeed the marring and tedious. His fear was indeed the marring and tedious. His fear was indeed the marring and tedious.

The Romans continued, as they had long, before, in Wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; the People often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Lfrica subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Myrrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever since the Victory) a heavy hand; and suffered Malaniffa to take from them what he liked. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome were afraid, though in defence of their own, not to take Arms: from which they were bound by an Article of Peace, except they were with leave of the Romans. Malaniffa therefore had great advantage over them: and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leave things as they found them.

So had He once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia : and so did he use them again and again ; with pretence of titles where he had any ; otherwise, without it. Galenus the Father of Majaniſſa had won fome Land from the Carthaginians ; which afterward Syſpas was taken from Gala, and within a while, reſtored to the Alors owners, for love of his Wife Sophoniſſa, and of Aſdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Majaniſſa take from them by force ; and by the Romans, to whose judgment the caſe was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Empire, to use all manner of ſubmiſſive obedience to Rome. They had ſcarcely digeſted this injury when Majaniſſa came upon them again, and took from them above twenty Towns and Caſtles without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaſſadors they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grievouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two Articles in their League : That they ſhould not make War out of their own Lands ; nor with any Conſederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Majaniſſa, invading their Country, however his plea was pleaded to call it his : yet ſince he was confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to bear defensive Arms againſt him, but truſted themſelves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated that either they might have fairer juſtice ; or be permitted to defend their own by ſtrong hand ; or, at leaſt, if right muſt wholly give place to favouriteneſs, that the Romans yet would be pleaſed to detourne mine, how far forth Masaniſſa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them Peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwise draw breath than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground weeping in hope to move compassion. Here may we behold, the fruits of their envy to that valiant House of the Barbaciens: of their irrelolution, in prosecuting a War so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfpenny-worthing, in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole Estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they Servants, even to the Servants of those Men, whose Fathers they have often chafed, slain, taken, and sold as bondslaves in the Streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Affrick and Greece. Now have they among of that Roman Peace, which Hanno lo often and so earnestly desired. And yet they want Peace with Masaniſſa, once their Enemy, and now their Master: for these their Torments, out of whose cruel hands, they beseech their Masters to take the office of correcting them. In such cases it is, to adore the Romans, whom they have nothing in such prosperity as might have been their ruin. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who lost the Batle at Canna; than Hannibal: that was it was used by the Carthaginians: that was freely bestowed, every Man of them all his private riches, upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreame want, to let out an Army into Spain, at what time the Enemy lay under their own Walls. These were no Carthaginian virtues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration, yet their tears may seem to have been misfrustrated, as proceeding no less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniſſa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by Arms: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little aims. Gulius, the Son of Masaniſſa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was demanded, called before the Senate: where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and he had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, that his Father not coming thoroughly aware of any Embassadors sent him from Carthage, had therefore not given them instructions, how to deal in that business. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Council divers nights, in the Temple of Venus; upon which he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common Enemies of the Romans and of his Father, might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Maſaniſſa his fake, they had done, and would do whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the Covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian War was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unseasonably to rebellion) or Maſaniſſa, at whose hands they expected no little help.

So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Maſaniſſa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Maſaniſſa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Africa round about him and Carthage therewithal should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perſeus. They visited him daily with Embassadors: that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Balkan were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pryed narrowly into his doings; and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done to sundry of his Neighbours, than with those wrongs, which they did (that he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any; they called it, making War upon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his Subjects, upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a People without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have presumed so far, unless either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them: Perſeus did soon allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angrily this presumption of the King, even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his own Rebels at home. Fain they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereto had he humbled once his Neck, they could themselves have done the part of Maſaniſſa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the League between them were such, as made it unlawful, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take Arms without their licence first obtained.

To the same pass they would also fain have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents; even such as had entered into League with them upon equal terms: whom usually they rewarded with a frown, whenever they presumed to right themselves by force of Arms, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwise bold to be their own carvers; and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chastised the Messenians by War, T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant in taking such a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprimanded, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance, by their own power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless, upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little; and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the privilege of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard lesson, they were fitch untoward Scholars, that they needed, and not long after felt very sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans, refused not only to give them such aid as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careless infelicity, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, that the Enemy might not be supplied from Italy, with Victuals or Arms. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedaemonians or Corinthians, would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would think it a business no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopemen: at what time it was believed, that the Commonwealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distress; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycurtus, Praetor of the Acheans, had utterly subdued the Messenians, far sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Acheans, but many entered into their corporation: then did the Romans with an illfavoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their own turns; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume unto themselves a Sovereign power, in directing all matters of War, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make War, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against men strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome: unless peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did help towards the accomplishment of their own secret malice. Now these Roman arts howsoever many (for gainful or timorous respects) would seem to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all Men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent City in Greece, having neither Subjects of their

their own that might rebel, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument whereto to practice their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, until the War of Mithridates: being Men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratuulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers of the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdoms, that with over nice diligence strove to preserve their liberties and lands, from confuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonians, as the most unpliant, and wherewith many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to break.

Neither Perſeus, nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perſeus by reason of his near Neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his Subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopemen had long since foretold: of the miserable subjection, wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatest, which kept all in fear. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soon be at an end; when honesty and love of the Common-wealth, became the fairer way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not ignorant: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom every City in Greece had too many); as were Men unregarded among their own People, and therefore more like to speak maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own desires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point whereto they refused to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the same business; chose one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embassy.

By their making choice of such a Man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plain sort of honest Men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome business of the weal publick. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himself therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alledging what was meetest in justification of his People: he uttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a custom, to stand upon points of confederacy, and Laws: as if these were principally to be had in regard; any injunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it that the Acheans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wills: who ceased not to affirm, That no Columns or Monuments erected, nor no solemn Oath of the whole Nation, to ratify the observance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to give ear unto such persuasions. For howsoever in popular Estates, the sound of liberty used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, seeming never to be had, were sure by their so doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that fought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea, and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon Men otherwise of little account or desert; only for having uttered some brave words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obnoxious, and by cherishing their friends, to make their party strong; resolved to follow this good counsel, in every point, yea to depress all those that held with the right, and to set up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their Mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callicrates; they advised all Men, to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their several Common-wealths. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful Man: having brought his Country into the way of ruin, but himself into the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himself, of his consequence yielded in the Senate. Only he reported his Embassy, that all Men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By the such arts he obtained to be made Praetor of the Acheans: in which Magistracy, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousness unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Asia to bid them look to themselves: who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own Right and Security? Toward this justification of the War, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto; their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his Errand was well known; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of Answers to the Words, which they knew before hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the wariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors: who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to Rebellion. The Rhodians had with great Pomp, conveyed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Lacidie; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans despectfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already ready vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the People of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange News which gave new Life to the Rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alienate quite from their own Protection any People or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meer Vassals, but as Dependants and Associates. For Proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the Victory against King Antiochus. Hence Eumenes, Melissus, the Asians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their Subjects, had cause to find themselves grieved if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like Decree, those their Subjects might easily be made their Fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by letting them and the Lycians together by the Ears. The Fathers could therefore lose no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassy they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of Anger. For whereas at other times, all care had been taken, to pacify them with gentle Words and Excuses: now heard they plainer Language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any Deed or Word of his, that might favour of Hostility; but that, in his Travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himself by Arms, and stand to the chance of War, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet were there good reason why Perseus himself might, at this time, think to speed better, by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the Eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman Servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general Expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of Spirit, unanswerable to a work of such Importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good Countenance on a Game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to Fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this Bravery (as better it may be termed than Courage) proceeded from the Kings own Heart; it appears by his daring to adventure soon after, on a Practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer cause of reason to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delfi in his way, and there do Sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his Blood, relieved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a Sacrifice, to rid his own Hands of a most mischievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Ruffians to do the Murder: who placing themselves behind a broken Mud Wall on the side of a very narrow Path leading up from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great Stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work; such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveyed away to the little Isle of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the Fame of his Death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his Brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took or would have taken to Wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonice the Daughter of King Antiochus, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbered among the rare Examples of Brotherly Love, That when the King returned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his Duty, as in former times, received none other Check, than That he should forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings Death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these Matters; but bequeathed at his Death, unto the same Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother; though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especial favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readiness, to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By such Concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld: as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived and employed his Grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he understood, that his Ministers had both accomplished his Will, and had saved all his discovery. But as he was deceived in the main Point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived: so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment: which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delfi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this Business; and the being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Ramminus a Citizen of Brundisium: who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret; had perfectly taught out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himself. Brundisium was the ordinary Port for Ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Ramminus a fair House; wherein he gave entertainment, being a Wealthy Man, to Embassadors, and other honourable Personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his Hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly Letters; as one whose many Courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming, he was much made of; and shortly with more Familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings Secrets. The sum of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a Payson of rare Quality, sure in Operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this Employment: for fear lest the Virtue of this Medicine should be tried upon himself. But being once at liberty; he discovered all. Ramminus was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see again: and therefore, besides that the Kings Denial ought to be as good as such a Fellows Affirmation, the Accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withal professing, That such Objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulness of making War upon him; but rather unto a Subject pleading for his Life in Judgment. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger Proof (which might have been easier) than any that we find by them produced: yet the bafe and cowardly Temper of Perseus was very futeable to these Practices. Neither did the Senate greatly intend to dispute the matter with him: These his Treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private Offences, it gave him no privilege: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not unlawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederate; that is, if he might not send men, to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns; might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the League to destroy the Senators by Fire or Famine, than by violence of the Sword: was it lawful for him to do it by Payson? Wherefore they presently decreed War against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it unto him, unless he would yield to make such amends as they should require. He seems, at this time, to have been so confident, in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not War, yet he did not fear it; or at least he thought by shew of Courage, to make his Enemies the more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary they departed without Audience. Then called he them back; and bad them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of *Samos*trage, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which, they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the Evidence, brought against him by Ramminus and Praxo. For if those Accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well beloved, and well friend. Perseus answered, for the present, in a Rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and Underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer Spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the League, made between them and his Father, and renewed by himself indeed only for fear; but wished them to defend to more equal Conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also do for theirs.

In the Form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as it is set down by Polybins, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future, excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livy inserts a Clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden, to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this Peace; whereby every one of the Neighbours round about Macedon, entering shortly into League with Rome, did so bind the Kings Hands, that he could no more make War abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain Covenant. And thus might that seem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this Point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear defensive Arms, without their Permission: then had Perseus very just reason to find himself grieved. For since they had allowed his Father, without controul, to make War in Thrace, (whilst they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their Licence: why should they now interpret the Bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such Allegations he maintained the right of his Cause, in very mild sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the League, as unjust; he misnifted occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their Message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he should have been less vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his Heart could serve him to undertake the War; he should courageously have managed it, and have fallen to work immediately, whilst the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse Peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks, to join with them in the War against Perseus. How the Greeks stood off in that War. The timorousness of Perseus. Marius a Roman Ambassador desires him with hope of Peace. His Forces. He takes the Field; and wins part of Thessaly. The Forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what difficulties the Romans had in this War. Of Tempe in Thessaly: and what Advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans; fights with them; knows not how to u'e his Victory; (ues for Peace; and is denied it by the Vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a Skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the War against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their Friends; for whose ease the Senate makes Provision; having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a concurrence of good Presences to make the War: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their Cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected; though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strength was such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the fair occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadiness a small help, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks, and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good Will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eastern People should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the diffidence between their several Estates; howsoever the generality of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless Embassadors were sent to deal with them all, and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words, for fashions sake; as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with such Roman courtship: and understood, that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this Business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans; * the Achæans and Rhodians were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in part of their duty. It is strange that men could be so earnest to see the side, whosoever they gladly would have seen the ruins. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not Opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chief of Historians was one; who though he * judged the Victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece; yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that by the Greeks might recover perfect liberty; for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that an extraordinary Fear, and not only Reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their Fear, may be justly imputed unto the timorous Demeanour of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few Companies brought over Sea, to make a Countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the Enemy's lair, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would serve to terrify him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giving him any tolerable Conditions of Peace, to take Revenge at leisure upon those that had afflicted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his Army; taking by force or composition, some few Towns; and soliciting all to join with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of Pacification: and to that end made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Marius, the chief of those Embassadors, and a Man of more fineness in cunning than was usual among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gave out such comfortable words, that the King intreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Marius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those Crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Marius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied: and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Marius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readiness, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interposition of this Truce, he no way increased his Forces; he suffered a most convenient season of winning upon the Enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vain hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had been with some Victory: publishing a Copy of the Disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best persuaded; not only to let them know how much he was Superior in Cause; but to treat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators to compound the Differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his Cause, he should be denied Peace. These were poor Helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than mere Vanity: his own safety being the utmost of his Ambition. This his fearfulness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of necessity, that was partly their own: had it not been his office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, Men grew daily more and more averse from him, and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling Wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partisans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entred of late into a strict society with the Macedonian: renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yielded themselves as Vassals. Neither was Marius contented to accept their submission under a general form; but caused their several Towns to make covenant apart, each for it self; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-wealths, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agellus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the Vertue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens; than was the Society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Marius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the City; where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed again by the Senate, with commission to deal as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse nor entreaty, would serve their turn; the Senate being resolved before hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they who came last on the same Errand, did their Message without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custom, enter the City) and had only the short warning of eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtesy serve alone to hide the craft of Marius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest-but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his business, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have roused Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he content to deliberate a while. Whether it were not better to offer himself tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdom, or that he might enjoy the rest, than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel prevailed: which also was the wisest; and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what should have been done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedonia. All being in readiness, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His Army he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse: whereof about twelve thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively Speeches; laying before them the glory of their Ancestors, the intolency of the Romans, the goodness of his cause, the greatness of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedonia there came likewise Messengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their several abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own Provisions would abundantly suffice; willing them only to furnish him with Carcs, for his Equipages and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass through that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Thessaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Asyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly then proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gave contumelious Language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a folly; which the Townsmen rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practised here, to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Pella and Comus (Towns of much importance, especially Comus, which stood in the freights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Syenium, a Town seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes, and Attalus his Brother, came to him in Thessaly, with four thousand Foot and a thousand Horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the several Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Mithridates first thither his Son Mithridates, with a thousand Foot, as many Horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up; yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptolemy (though Ptolemy was then young, and under Tutors) had business of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egypt; yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians:

* Polybius of their help to the Romans; * the Achæans and Rhodians were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in part of their duty. It is strange that men could be so earnest to see the side, whosoever they gladly would have seen the ruins. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not Opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Coun-

yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucius, the Roman Admirals Brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucius took away, after a very kind fort; making them to believe, That for none other end than to serve the Romans, their good friend Genius had sent thither this Fleet. But whatsoever Genius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdom and himself, in the end of this War; by offering, rather then giving, his help to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Thessaly: so tired with a painful Journey, through the mountainous Country of Atbamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been in Thessaly, attending his descent into the Plains, that Perseus must needs have taken a great Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender help, that could enable him to deal with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keep his Trenches, until his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himself in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Thessaly, in which these two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope of expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to Mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full at large, to signify the name was often used at large, to signify the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley, of itself was not great: but adding to it those huge Mountains, Offa and Olympus (famous in Poësie) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unless they would make an hungry Journey, thorow the Country of the Dafarvians, as in the former War with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being Master of the Streights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the sword; yea to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionless he might have done far greater things, had he seized upon the Streights of Aour, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus. Surely without extrem difficulty, must the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or else have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses they once deviled, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present War. It may perhaps be said, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King must have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Atolians, upon whom the Atbamians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall find anon) even as they met with Perseus. The Beotians, how politic forever Marius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrel: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himself after a while began to waver, when they saw things go better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for Peace; he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well willers, yea and bought down with Money (as he might have done) some of his Enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken Head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forsake their imperious Patronage over Greece; and to render the liberty, by them given, entire; which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have been expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearful Country running from their Enemies, till some River stay their flight; are there compelled by meer desperation to do such acts, as done, while the Barrel lasted, would have won the Victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that War, whereof he should have sought the honour; he left his friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their own safety: yet being overtaken by necessity, he chose rather to bet his back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such misery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessaly, it is hard to shew particularly; for that the History of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the Sum.

The Consul having no desire to fight, until such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perfwaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the Field; by waisting the Land of the Phereans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity, he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in Horle would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was fiden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his Horle, and with them some light Armed Foot, to entertain skirmish. The Captain, and some other of these were slain; but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazard Barrel. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering Barrel: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness much encreased; and much more, his reputation: to the grief of those, who being so far come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Town of Sycium, upon which Perseus then lay, was twelve Miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the Morning; but he was fain to bring Water along with him in Carts, that his Men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, seven Miles nearer to the Enemy, whom he visited the next day by the Sun rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with tumult: informing as though he brought with him only his Horle and light Armour, that were unfit to assail the Trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horle, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armour, to trie their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readines. The honour of this Morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner entire, (though the Thessalians made a good Retreat) with little loss of his own. But he discovered his weakness ere Night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to Counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear lest he should assault their Camp; and to that purpose, upon the first news of his success, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unseen far: he re moderate his Victory: by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of Peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater; and had he won the Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for Peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the Victory, what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him: At this time the joy of his Victory would admit none of these considerations. He had slain of the Roman Horle two hundred, and taken of them Prisoners the like number. Of their Foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty Horle and forty Foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heaviness and fear: it being much doubted that the Enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsel to dislodge by Night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to profess, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loss past, than by standing on proud terms, to draw upon himself a greater calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the Night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Atolians were sorely blamed for this loss: as if rather a Trayterous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Men of especial mark, had been observed, to be the first which turned their backs: an observation Heretofore as cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their virtue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn, by examples of either kind, that if they would

than indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no less for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former days error: which how great it was, he not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that Night: his light Armour alone being sufficient to have routed them, whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to let what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consul, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopsus, a place in the mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to press them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perfwaded to use the occasion which he seemed to have, of obtaining Peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same conditions, wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans, if the War might to take end. It were needless, here again to show the folly of this counsell. Towards the accomplishment of this desired Peace, there was in the Consul no greater power, than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People, to approve the conditions, and ratifie the League. And of such a Truce granted by Marius, he had lately found no small discomfort round. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of Peace there was none; save that Perseus would yield both his Kingdom and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the Peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with Money, the King withdrew himself back to Sycium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Majagenes the Son of Majansilla, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harve: about which business they ranged over all the Fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the foragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a Guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of Horle, or (for the report is divers) in a great Barrel, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus,

[and] after a few days to fall back into Macedonia; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was: whereby what loss he felt will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, save only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easy prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Comus; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back upon the Peribœians and others; from whom he won some Towns, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry Towns thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul took, may seem, not to have belonged unto the Thessalians; unless, perhaps, after his Victory, Perseus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the Histories of them are greatly defective. One may think it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrify, and bring altogether to his own will, should not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their Coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had been. The causes hereof were to have been sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admiral: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebel in like sort, if by excessive oppression he could have driven them so far. Neither did the Consul undiligent in the same kind. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I find no where mentioned. Only this is said in general: That in the War which he made, he "cruelly and covetously demeaned himself."

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hofilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admiral, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hofilius shewed more of his industry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the War against the Macedonians. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Consul had fought passage in vain over certain Mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, "free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Lybia."

by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Army of four thousand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Uscana, a border Town of Lybia, by Treason, came thither in such careless order, that the inhabitants which had made show of treason, with purpose only to train him into danger, sallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so far, that hardly he escaped with a fourth part of his Company. Yet this Town of Uscana shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soon recovered it, and many other places therewithal: Cotys, a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedonia; and Cephalus an Epircæ revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painful Journey into Ætolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest City in that Region. Of this hope, though he was disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his return home, he took in Aspericia; and shortly heard good news, That Ap. Claudius was again thoroughly beaten by Cleotas, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian War under Hofilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into Mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and main to advance their business, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Athens, Lycor, Philetas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his Son Polybius, who soon after was General of the Achaean Horse; but more notable by that excellent History which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honorably discharged. The sum of the accusation should have been; That these were not hearty friends unto the Romans; but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lack of opportunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætoliens: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Council that approved the motion: as also among the Aceruanians, there were that entreated to have Roman Garrisons in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions took effect. The good of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no less then a matter of Treason, to be a Gretian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these Pick-thanks of their base flattery; raising them openly in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as Men that could believe none ill; though it were well enough known what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all Men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present War, unless it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought it were such, as the whole Country was lybia. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad; for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that standing on privilege hereof, refused to fulfil every Commandment, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this War proved little better, if not worse, than to have been Traitors. The Senate was driven to set down this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great Sum of Money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their Subjects oppressed. Hortensius being still in place, had warning to amend.

Among

Among the great number of Embassadors that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redress of injuries, or to offer their Services: it is noteworthy, that from Alabanda, a Town of the lesser Asia, there was preferred unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flattery. These Alabanders brought three hundred Horsemen Targets, and a Crown of Gold, to bestow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratify the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the Town Rome, and appointed Anniversary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that Goddys. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and the like vain Men, that would be thought Gods; or at the shameless flattery of such as bestow upon Man, and not the most virtuous of Men, divine honours: when he sees a Town of Houses, wherein powerful Men dwell, worshipped as a Goddessa, and receiving (without scorn of the givers, or shame of the present) the Title of Deity, at the gift of such a rascal City as Alabanda?

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardice of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Diium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their affairs in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad Man. Polybius sent Embassador to Martius from the Achæans. Polybius his counsel wisdom beneficial to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows exasperated to the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Genetius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman War. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be Arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus loses a mighty succour of the Bactaræ, by his wretched parsimony.

AFTER two years of the Macedonian War, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the War began, which had been thought likely to reform all those Countries, and bring them to what pass the Romans desired, as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in Peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the War might prove, and thereupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hofilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vain, seeking way into Macedonia; and defaced the glorious enterprise of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many Towns, even of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman side; and the Army much lessened, not only by casualties of War, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himself (for they laid the blame on one upon the other) in licensing the Soldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Consul, who succeeded unto Hofilius, was to amend all this:

which nevertheless was more than he knew how to do: though he brought with him a strong supply of Men. He began hody to set the War on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the Streights that were furly Guarded, but taking pains to climb the Mountains, which were thought able to forbid all passage over them, without help or need of any custody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, distributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his Journey: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemy, or to break through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him; and at length, if all failed, to make a safe Retreat. He sent before him four thousand of his most expedite Foot, to discover the ways. Two day was this Company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles; after which they had fight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a false piece of ground; and sent back word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to halten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three days together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loss on either side.

This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a Mountain, which gave scarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a flame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only course remaining; and indeed the best. Part of his Men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilst he, with the rest, fetched a compass about, and fought out ways that never had been trodden. Herein he found extreme difficulty: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such Journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might seem to have intended, that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the Mountains, in this way which he took: that of seven miles, which they travelled the first day, his Men were compelled, as not daring to trust their Feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with Rocks, that stood one over another, so upright, and cumbersome to get down; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their Governours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the Horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous Journey; there was nothing more desired by the Soldiers, than that they might be suffered to creep back again, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of Bridges, like unto falling Draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joynted to the edge of the Cliff; the other sustained by two long Posts, fastened in the ground below. Upon these two Posts, or Poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two Rattens, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one Bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with Planks and Turf; that they might seem continent with the Ground;

to make the Beasts adventurous, to go upon them. If there were a Plain of any good extent from the foot of a Rock, to the next downhill; then might the Bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of these; the Poles upholding the Frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sink down upon the next Bridge: whence he was conveyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still, to the very bottom. Thus went they down sliding, some on their feet, others by their Buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans used to be in their Journeys, of things needful in all occasions: as also was inestimable pains they took in this defence, about the conveyance of themselves and all their Carriages down the Mountains. The next day they rested: having for Peplius and his Company, who hardly, or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth days Journeys were like unto the first: save that custom, and the nearness to their ways end without meeting Enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with his Men upon the passage, three days together; he lying to night, that he might well near have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with fear; that he neither stirred to help his own Men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsel, fate learkening after the event. Four only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Comus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it: the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whoever would seek any other way, must be fain to take such pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his Enemies could not get thither, save through the valley it self, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge Mountain Olympus, about a Mile from the Sea: of which Mile, the River Helicon becoming there a Lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half; the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all this, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten Men might easily keep: where the Spurs of the Mountains, reaching far into the Valley, drew near to the very Banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep River which ran thence by it. Wherefore nothing had been more easy, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome Journey: if Perseus could have seen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travel: but must needs have either perished for want of Victuals, or been enforced to return the same way that it came, if the King had made good the freight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and Carriages, against those Rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get down, it seems a matter of impossibility: especially considering, how the Enemy, from above their heads, would have beaten upon them: being now aware of the Path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their Journey into Ma- cedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despised to win. But the Cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsel by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe; than he fared like one out of his wits; flying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without Barrel. Herewithal he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightways abandoned the Town. In the same vehemency of amazement, he sent a fratic commandment to Theffalonia, that the Arsenal there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his Treasures there should be cast into the Sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drown the Treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soon after, his Master grew sorry for the loss; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the Water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set on fire the Kings Arsenal, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether, Nicias, for his absolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easy pardon; it is referred in the King to interpret. The reward of their service was this. Perseus growing affamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction, caused them both to be slain. All those poor Men, which had fetched his Treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were paid their wages after the same sort; that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they fear, who are privy to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so Royally have behaved himself, that no Man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or counsel. But his virtue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had stopped the Consul on the Top of the Mountain) and Epiphanes, from defence of the passages, whereof they were by him appointed, he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy, the Gates and Bars of Macedon. Of this reproach if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to rejoice, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading therein: to since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of Victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a days Journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled, by mere lack of food for his Men, to return back towards Theffaly. His Fleet came to him in this time of needfulness, well appointed to have holpen him in the War; but having left behind, at Mygdonia, the Ships of burthen, which carried the Provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by thofe ways only might Corn be brought into the Army.

To meet the sooner with this Corn, which was desperately expected; he forsook Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish Journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable, that his Carriage, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the Mountains: for otherwise it had been madness to put himself on such an Enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, he should be fain to quit it. Howsoever it was; Men thought him a Coward, or at least a bad Man of War; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behoved him to have prosecuted the Action.

By understanding the Folly or Cowardise of Martius; the King recollected himself; underflood his own Error; fought to hide it by such poor means as have been shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the Town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the River Enipeus, meaning there to stop the Enemies Proceeding all that Summer. Less diligence, more timely used, would have been enough not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of Peace: but to have given him such a Noble Victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the War upon fair Conditions, and not to begin again in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his Office. Only the Town of Heraclaea, standing on the River of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force; or rather by a trick of climbing upon Mens Heads, somewhat after the manner of our Tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope, was nothing like so great: his chief care being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Theffalonia, Callandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were assailed: but in vain. The Fields about Theffalonia were wasted; and some Companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, were still put to the worse. As for the Town it self, there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reason of the Engines, which shot from the Walls, and reached unto the Fleet. Wherefore the Admiral retiring far from thence, ran a long by Amia, and Amigonea (landing near to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt), until he came unto Pallene, in the Territory of Callandrea. There King Emmenes joyined with him, bringing twenty Ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accession of strength the Admiral was bold to trie his Fortune at Callandrea: (which was bad. There was a new Ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the Town: which while the Romans were filling up, question was made, what became of the Earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the Bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town Wall filled up with that Earth, and covered with one single row of Brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by fapping the Walls. To this work he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an Alarm to the other side of the Town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The Breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shooting for joy, and ordering themselves for the Assault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and falling forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the Companies that were between the Ditch and the Wall; of whom they flew about six hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good success on that part of the Town which King Emmenes assailed (a supply in the mean while entering the Town by Sea) caused the Siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias; wherein Emmenes, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with such Forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had layed siege to it, but to keep the Land about it from Spoil; or at least (as they did) to make the Enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Emmenes had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melba; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly over their Heads, caused the Besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Camp on fire.

Such Fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their Ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) lost unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them; or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this War. For the broken remaining Rhodiens, by Agrippius, the Embassador, who came to him at Heraclaea about their business of less importance, that they should do well to interpose themselves as Mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polybius do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodiens in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made shew of fear, it is like whilst that, somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeited. And so were the Rhodiens moved to think of him; and not only for that the extraordinary courtesy, both of him and of the Admiral, towards their Embassador, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesses at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the Honour of some Victory, wherein he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman Horse. Thus much we find intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the Fight be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome, to view the Estate of Martius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting Meat; the Admiral wanting Men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both Money and Cloaths: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the Frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, thence, or a new Army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Myrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater loss, than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Towns which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Marius in very deed did his Actions, behaved himself like a man of War : yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or fiesker kind of wisdom, he dealt as a Craftsman, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proved his Sufficiency, nor commended his Honesty : since thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit : and nevertheless, by our country's glory, or such delight as ambitious men are wont to take, in creating insupportable troubles, he directly made opposite to the good of his Country. At length he was as Pericles, by the success of his doings against Hoplitas, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Theffaly; Arcbo, Lycotas, and other good Patriots among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to help the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Arcbo proposed a Decree withal to pass. That the Acheans should send thither what Power into Theffaly they pleased, to assist the Romans in all danger.

So the Army was leaved; and Polybius, with others, fence Embassadors unto Marius, to certify him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busied in looking passage through Tepe into Macedon. He went along with the Army; and, against the Consul's leisure, till they came to Hecuba, where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein forever it should be commanded. Marius took this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his Companions, to signify thus much: tarrying himself behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Marius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required of the *Achaean*s, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in Field, he might do notable service, by distracting the Forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthine Head of Marius could not allow of such plain reason. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aid: and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wile take order that the Men might not be sent, nor the *Achaean*s be put to such needless charges. Away went Polybius; musing, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the *Achaean*s, that the Consul was so earnest in this business; or rather for envy, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, since himself could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Council, touching this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own self, and those of his Party. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul; if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Marius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his Friends, if openly they should refuse to help Claudius, alleging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted Men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unless by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Conful; by whom it was fure to be made fruftrate. Herely the Acheans were favers of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himfelf ran into danger of Appius his difpleafure; and for fuch honeft dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprifonment.

Whether it were by the like Policy of Marius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his Affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late to stand in fear, left the Fire which he himself had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own Lodging; or whether the regard of Money were able to overway all other Passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as give any help to Marius: but coming to have joyed with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certain Horle of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true; and that his Brother Attalus carrying behind with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, born afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received, that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perseus his desire of accord, for meer desire of gain. And it might well be, that covetousness drew him on, in the course, wherinto indignation first led him. Howsoever it befel; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to solicit him by an Embassy. The Tenour of his Advertisements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was, That there could be no perfect Love, between a King and a Free City: that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Here-with he willed Eumenes to confider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his War with the Aegyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their Will and Pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compel the Romans, to surcease from their War upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common Enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way; and therefore was little troubled with such Remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had hereafter to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer; he began to offer bargain of Peace for Money. He thought the Romans to be no less weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, that if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his Hand from this War, then would he remain a Neutral therein: and that for greater quantity of Money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans: to condescend unto Peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give Hostages. Perfus liked well to receive the Hostages: as he would not to lay out the Money: especially before hand, as was required. He would fain have Peace with Rome, and not with Eumeses only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the Money in the Temple at Samsabrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumeses, as soon as the Peace was fully concluded and ratified. The like of Samsabrace was Perfus's his own: and therefore Eumes thought the Money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his Wages in preſt. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumeses grew suspected of the Romans: as a Traitor.

Alter the same manner deale Perfus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; but deale plainly, and faid, That without Money, he could not fir. Hereunto Perfus loved not to hearken; thinking that his Treasures would serve at the laft call, to deliver him from all his Fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to Prodigality; fo as he agreed to pay three hundred Talens, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and Pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perfus; to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by fuch accels of ftrength to their Parry. Prefently upon the bargain made, Embaffadors were fent to Rhodes, from both Perfus and Gentius: who defired the Rhodiens, to take upon them, as Arbitrators, between Perfus and the Romans, and to bring the War to an end. The Rhodiens thinking that Martius the Conful was no lef defirous of Peace than the Macedonians, arrogantly promifed, That they by their Authority, would make Peace; withing the Kings to throw themfelves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud Words, to the fame effect, from the Rhodian Embaffadors; gave an answer, as difdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could devise; fo as this vain Glory of the Rhodiens was thoroughly chafed; and more thoroughly fhould have been, if their fubmiffion had not been as humble, as their Folly was proud. Such ufe of Gentius his Friendfhip, made Perfus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now Iain he would have hafted this young and rafh Illyrian to enter with all fpeed into the War: but then muft the Money be haftned away. Pantauchus, the Macedonian Embaffador, who remained with Perfus his friend, him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilft the Romans were unprovided for. But finding what it was that made Perfus to flay: he fent word to Perfus. Whereupon two Talens were fent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as earnestly, as that which followed. More followed indeed; and ftaled up with the Seal of the Illyrian King; but carried by Macedonians, and not by Illyrians. Before this Money came into Illyria, Gentius had laid hands upon two Roman Embaffadors, and caft them into Prifon. Which Perfus no fooner heard, than he recalled his Treafure-bearers, and fent them with their load to Pella: for that now the Illyrian was of neceffity to make War with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto, or not.

There came about the same time, through lyria, to the aid of Perſeus, under one Clomachus a Petry King, ten thousand Horſe and ten thousand Foot, of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bæſſæne. Theſe had before hand made their bargain, and were to receive preſent pay at the firſt. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perſeus ſent one to them; deſiring their Captains to come viſit him, whom he promiſed to gratifie with goodly Rewards; hoping that the Multitude would take good words for payment. But the firſt Queſtion that their General asked, was, Whether the King had ſent Money to give the Souldiers their Pay in hand, according to his bargain?
Hereto the Meſſenger ſaid, not what to answer.
Why then ſaid Clomachus tell thy Maſter, that the Gauls will not ſtir one foot further, until they have Gold, as was agreed, and Hoſtages.
Perſeus herupon took counſel: if to utter his own opinion, before men to wiſe that they would not contradit him, were to take counſel. He made an invective againſt the incivility and avarice of the Bæſſæne: who came with ſuch numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thouſand Horſe of them, he ſaid, would be as many as he ſhould need to uſe; and not to many, that he ſhould need to fear them.
It had been well done, if any of his Counſel-lors would have told him, that there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, ſince without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out by the way of Perrheſia, into Theſſaly:
where waſting the Countrey, and filling themſelves with Spoil, they ſhould make the Romans glad to forſake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable ſervice, whether they won any Victory, or not.
This, and a great deal more might have been adledged, if any Man had dared to give advice freely. In concluſion Antigenus, the Meſſenger whom he ſent before, was ſent again, to let them know the Kings mind. He did his Errand: upon which followed a great Murmur of thoſe many thouſands that had been drawn fo far to no purpoſe. But Clomachus asked him now again, whether he had brought the Money along with him, to pay thoſe five thouſand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigenus could make no better answer than ſhutting excuſes; the Bæſſæne returned preſently towards Danubius, waſting the Neighbour parts of Thrace; yet fuſſering this crafty Meſſenger to eſcape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

This dealt Perſeus, like a careful Treafurer, and one that would preſerve his Money for the Romans, without diminiſhing the fun. But of this painful Office he was very ſoon diſcharged by L. Amelius Paulus the new Conſul: who in fifteen days after his leaving forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which GOD had appointed over it a King fo fooliſh and fo cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul. His Journey. He forbids Perseus to disengage. He will not hazard Battle with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmilius his Superstition. The Battle of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yields to Æmilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yields himself to the Roman Admiral; and is sent Prisoner to Æmilius.

BY the War of Macedonia, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet it seemed the indignity so moved them, that either they decreed that Province to L. Æmilius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that so worthy a Man was advanced to the dignity of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; until by Embassadors, thither sent to view the Estate of the War, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly known to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong Supply, not only unto the Consul, but unto the Navy, and likewise to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which Ap. Claudius was removed, and L. Ancius sent thither in his place. Æmilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the Custom, spake with much Gravity and Authority. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this War, either to accompany him into Macedonia, and there assist him with their Advice; or else to govern their Tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hear-say, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the Multitude. The like Speech of his Father L. Æmilius, who died valiantly in the Battle of Cannæ, might well be living in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his business within the City being dispatched, Æmilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his Journey; with an especial hope of Men, that he should finish the War: though that he should finish it so soon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium; whence, when the Wind came fair, he set Sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done Sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp; and was there in five days more. So are there but five of the fifteen days remaining, in which he finished the War.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Diem; having feared no labour of Men and Women to fortify the Banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in dry weather. So as there was little hope, or none, to force them; and consequently as little possibility to enter that way into Macedonia. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disturbing them to make attempt upon Diem, was lack of fresh Water. For there were ten miles between Diem and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea Shore and the Foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmilius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the Shore where he found sweet Springs; as commonly there is no Shore that wants them, though they rise not above the Ground. Want of this Knowledge was enough to hinder Marius from taking up his Lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could perform no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no less difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way; which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perræbia: hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a fair journey. Marius either had not been informed hereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the Adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work, as had been their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a Man of greater Industry, Courage, and Ability, to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp; teaching the Souldiers, among other good Lessons, to be obedient and ready in Execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the Doings and Purposes of their General. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African; the other by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings Guard, upon the Mountain, consisted in manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darkness took away their aim, they were like to make a bad Nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the business about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet; where Victuals were provided for their Journey: it being notified, that they were to run along the Coast of Macedonia by Sea, and waste the Country. All the while that they were passing the Mountains (which was about three days) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay; rather to divert the Kings Attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The Chancel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time, a great fall of Waters from the Mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the Ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Æmilius employed none save his Voltures; of whom the Kings light Armour had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own Bank, did also beat upon the Romans; and gave them an

derstand, that their Labour was in vain. Yet Æmilius persifted as he had begun; and recovered his Affair, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to reach the Macedonian, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Æmilius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such Bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus only looked unto that which was before his Eyes: until his men that came running fearfully down the mountain, brought war into the Camp. That the Romans were following at their Backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himself no less (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge, or rather, without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and a speedy Retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custody of the Passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force; Scipio and Fabius had very good luck in their Journey. It may well be, that they slept until the Romans came somewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their Arrows and Slings could do little Service, were beaten at handy strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedonia: which had been effected by Marius in the year fore-going; but was closed up again, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in extrem doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice, to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years Example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But far worse Council prevailed; as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of Battle: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even the same that Æmilius, or any Invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light Armour. There he abode the coming of the Enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soon as the Romans had fight of the Kings Army; which, with greater fear than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Camp that was so notably well fortified, they desired nothing more, than to give Battle immediately; doubting lest otherwise the King should change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Æmilius told him that he spake like a young Man; and therefore would him to have patience. The Romans were tired with their Journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare Ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand, and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of Battle; gave charge to have the Camp made out and entrenched behind the Army; whereunto at good leisure, he fell back without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own General too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King he excused himself by the backwardness of the Enemy; who advanced no further, but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That Evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Prætor, foretook unto the Consul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same Night: willing the Souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was natural, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pans of Brass and Basons, as we do in following a swarm of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this Prognostication of Sulpicius converted their Superstition into admiration of his deep Skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noise as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their Fæthion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a Prodigious; brokering their loss; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, whether such Eclipses do signify, or cause, any alteration in Civil Affairs, and Marces that have small dependance on natural Concomers: for the Argument is too large. More worthy of observation is it, how Superstition captivates the Wisdom of the Wise, where the help of true Religion is wanting. Æmilius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of Human Understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his Duty, to this Moon, and congratulating with Sacrifice her delivery, as soon as the moon out bright again: for which, he is commended even by Plutarch a Sage Philosopher, as a Godly and Religious Man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish Devotion; yet is it like, that he being a Senator, and one of the Council for War, was partaker the next Morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no less foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vows to be tokens of good luck in the Entrails of the Beasts. At length in the Belly of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of Victory to Æmilius; but with condition, that he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in Alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new Goddess, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, Founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of older date were more Authentical) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of Military Affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour with no injunctions contrary to the rules of War.

Now concerning the Battle; Æmilius was thoroughly perswaded, that the King meant to have bide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed moved a Pydna, when, as a little before, his leisure served to retire whether he lifted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Confil thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the Morning Sun was full in the Romans Faces: which would be much to their hindrance all the Forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius sent forth part of his Men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about Ten of the Clock in the Morning, a small occasion brought to pass that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over earnest desire. A Horse brake loose at Watring; which two or three of the Roman Souldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the Knees. The Kings Men lay on the further Bank; whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this Horse over to their own side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countreimen seeing this, hasted to revenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slain him over the River. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it pass a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the Event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his Men in order of Battel, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Arms, wherewith they served, did require. The Ground was a flat level, save that on the sides a few Hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better Souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Confil encouraged their Men with lively words; which the present condition could boundlessly afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his Men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do Sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the less marvel, that he durst adventure Battel, since he had betrothed himself of such a Stratagem, whereby to save his own Person. As for Hercules, he liked not the Sacrifice of a Coward: whose unreasonable devotion could be no better than hypocritie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the Battel, he found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the fight. The acts of this day, such as we find recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly press onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much astonished; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-born, many of them slain, and the Squadrons following them to discourage herewith, as they retired apace towards an Hill. These were the things that fell out adverse to the Romans; and which the Confil beholding, is said to have rent his Coat-armour for grief. If the King with all his power of Horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the Victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the Battel, was the fame which doubtless the Confil expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty, or almost impossibility, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small Battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the sword) that some Files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to pass, admitted the Confil, what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targetiers; according to direction given by Æmylius, when he saw the Front of the Enemies great Battel become unequal, and the Ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small Squadrons, as it had been formerly in the Battel of Cynosephale: yea, this form of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would break of it self; though here were little such inconvenience of Ground as had been at Cynosephale.

Perseus when he saw his Battel begin to rout, turned his Bridle presently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his Horse escaped, in a manner, untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poor Foot; they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that Battel, only some fourscore, or sixscore Men at the most. Some of the Foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his Company in a Wood: where they fell to railing at the Horsemen, calling them Cowards, Traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himself: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the Company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that days misfortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; he found his Pages and household Servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great Men that had escaped from the Battel, there was none appearing in the Court. In this Melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldness to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unreasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare some greater mischief; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. These followed him likewise about five hundred Cretians; more for love of his Money, than of him. To these he gave of his Plate, as much as was worth about fifty Talents, though shortly he cozened them of some part thereof; making them as if he would have redeemed it; but never paying the Money. The third day after the Battel he came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townsmen to fidelity, with Tears; and his own speech being hindered by Tears, appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chief care, to look well to

to themselves. Upon the first fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thousand Thracians that lay there in Garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and shutting the Gates after them. And now to be rid of the King; they plainly had Evander be gone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but embarking himself and the Treasure which he had there, in certain Vessels that he found in the River Strymon; passed over to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live safe, by privilege of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the less doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Æmylius, within so few days after his Victory. Pydna which was nearest at hand, was the last that yielded. About six thousand of the Souldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the Battel into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippus who had kept the passage over Ossa against Martius, with Pantarchus, who had been sent Embassador to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves and the Town of Berea, whither they had retired out of the Battel. With the like Message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two days: the loss of the head bereaving the whole Body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out a day longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their Gates upon such terms, that the lack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius sent abroad into the Country, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himself marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while he shall have more.

It was soon understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary, in the Temple at Samothrace: his own Letters to the Confil, confirming the report. He sent these Letters by Persons of such mean condition: that his safe was pitied, for that he wanted the Service of better Men. The scope of his writing was, to desire favour: which though he begged in terms ill becoming a King; yet since the Inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Confil Paulus; the Confil, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make answer thereunto. So there came other Letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to confer with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless in this conference, he was marvelous earnest, that he might be allowed to retain the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that he had so carefully preserved his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himself with such vain hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for Money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and be called King. Yea it seems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the War he was decorated by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for such a paltry Island; and for that he offered to lay up the Money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and without more ado, to yield to the discretion and mercy of the People of Rome. This is so far against his mind, that the conference breaks off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admiral, with his Fleet: who affays, as well by terrible threats, as by fair Language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for fear of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himself. When all this would not serve, a question was moved to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy privilege of Sanctuary, by attempting the Murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof unless he can clear himself in judgment, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himself is charged with the same Crime. But what will this avail, when the Minister of the Fact being brought into Judgment, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perseus therefore will with Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand, who are like to be presidents and overseers of this judgment: so as it were better to die valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good Plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander seems to like well: and either kills himself, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get Pylos wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this Man, who had stuck to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his Wife and Children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell Perseus tales, and say, That the King hath lost the privilege of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm so much, who shall dare to gain say them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captivity; he purposed to make an escape, and fly, with his Treasures, unto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Orandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one Ship; who easily was persuaded to wait the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings Money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himself, with his Wife and Children (if rather it were not true, * Plutarch, that he had with him only * Philip his elder Son, in vit. 25 who was only by adoption his Son, being his mol. * Brother by nature) with much ado got out at a Window by a Rope, and over a Mud Wall. At 25. 1. lib. his coming to the Sea side, he found no Orandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the Money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the Shore: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his Lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, left he should be taken; he hid himself in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him; ran up and down down making enquiry: all Olivius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samostrace, should have their Lives and Liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that life, or at home in Macedon, conditionally. That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans: Hereupon they all came in. Like-wile Ima, a Theffalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his Children, delivered them up to Olivius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the Gods of Samostrace, that he had no better protected him; rendered himself, and made the Roman Victory complete. If he had not trusted in those Gods of Samostrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein: he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight: he became a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He has been presently sent away to Amphilus; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Amphilus used to him the Language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost alacrity; for that such was the Mercy of the People of Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consul's Table, and respectfully entertained, he was committed Prisoner to Q. Atilius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithal had the Kingdom of Macedon: the Glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

About the same time, and with like celerity, Anticus the Roman Prator, who succeeded unto Asp. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Issus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the Money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anticus arrested him on the way; fought with him; overcame him; and drove him into Scodra. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem unpossible to be won, in any not a very long time. Yet Anticus was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the Walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired Truce for three days, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into Prison; where they were still alive. Having obtained three days respite, he passed up a River, within half a Mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his Brother Caracantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scodra. He sent Messengers craving access unto the Prator: before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his Wife, Children, Brother, and Friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty days: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anticus how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon, after their Victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmanfully toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their Errand again; that they performed with bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes, to make an Overture of Peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this War was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassy to Rome, not for love to Rome, but in favour of the Macedonians: whose Partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in Mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City; beseeching all Men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent Prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flew themselves for fear, whose Goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a Man by nature valiant, had not uttered a mild Sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it,

* Cato in thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere, by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the Society of the Romans: a favour which, till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it as equal friends.

With the like, or greater feverity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amphilus himself made progress through the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure; yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias were slain at one time by those of the Roman Faction, and with help of the Roman Soldiers. Others fled, or were banished and their Goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redress was such, as required not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the Liberty of their Country, he feasted like a King, with excessive cheer; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easy matter, since no Man durst be backward in sending Provisions, nor set on them the due Price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the Estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was usual in such cases; and some, to visit the Affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Amphilus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefrom from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been paid unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest; the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent Captive into Italy, with their Wives and Children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated; and new given by Amphilus. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not Subjects to Rome; the things done to them could deserve no better name than mere Tyranny, yea and shameless Perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of Confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such Men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unfeverable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made free enough. Some of these had sent Letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no Subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for using them as Traitors, or at least as Enemies. But since only two Men were Beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Achaean these Embassadors were to deal more formally: not so much because that Commonwealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by Letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achaean could be suppositively charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistratus, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all Men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served fitly to rank the Achaean with the rest. And hereto Callistratus, was very urgent; fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his Fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achaean: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callistratus had before instructed him. He said, That some of the chief among them, had with Money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such Men might be condemned, whom, after Sentence given, he would name unto them. After Sentence given (cried out the whole Assembly) what Justice were this; name them first; and let them answer; which if they could not well do, we will soon condemn them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prators, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this Crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate Man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof, if any Man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appear, and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the Captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the Honestest and Worthiest Men were carried from home, for none other cause than their love unto their Country: to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that Virtue and regard of the publick Liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into Prison, as Men already condemned by the Achaean. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since Honestly had been thus punished as a Vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to inform the Senate, that these Men were neither condemned by the Achaean, nor yet held to be offenders. But instead of better answer it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these Men should return into the Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achaean, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; until after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that Wife and Vertuous Man Polysius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in Prison; or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way be-sent they came to Rome, or whether out of Jyl, after that they were committed thereto, suffered Death as Malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epiroti. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet whilst, to gratify the Soldiers, gave order, That the whole Country of Epirus should be put to Sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Antiochus with malicious subtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to use the Liberty bestowed upon them by the People of Rome; he sent unto the Epiroti for Ten of the Principal Men out of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into every of their Towns, what Companies of Men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the Money. But he gave secret instruction to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed they should fall to sack, every one the Town whereinto he was sent. Thus in one day were threecore and ten Cities, all Condemned with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Soldiers: and besides other acts of Hostility in a time of Peace, a Hundred and fifty thousand of that Nation made Slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epiroti deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they, among this People, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had, even in this War, done good Service to the Romans: I hold this act to be wicked, that I should not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the less marvelous, that God was pleased to make Aemilius Childless, even in the Glory of his Triumph, how great soever otherwise his Vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their Victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embassy sent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we speak, we must speak somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himself, and of his Affairs about which these Ambassadors came.

§. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

Antiochus the Great, after his Peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his Reign and Life. He died the six and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolemy Ephippas: while he attempted to Rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Josius) of Jupiter. He left behind him three Sons, Selenus Philopator, Antiochus Ephippas, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in Marriage to Ptolemy Ephippas, King of Egypt. Selenus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his Sons, Reigned in Syria twenty years, according to Enchiridion, Appian, and Cassius Dio; though Josius give him but seven. A detestable Prince, who as he was florid by nature, so great loss which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his Birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et stabit Domus tua in loco ejus villisimam et indignam decore regio. And in 21. his place (speaking of Antiochus the Father of this Man) shall start up a vile Person, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Selenus, whole things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect. What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, because of the Godliness of Onias the Priest, it came to pass, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple; and of Heliadus sent by the King to seize them; and of his miraculous striking by God; and his recovery at the Prayers of Onias; or of the Kings death, and of his Successor Antiochus Ephippas. It is therefore from the Reign of this King, that the Books of the Maccabees take beginning: which Books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his story, nor of the acts of his Successors, till the time of Antiochus Ephippas, the Brother and Successor of this Selenus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the Hundred threecore and feventeenth year of the Greeks in Syria) that first Book treateth. The Author of the second Book, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Prologue, yet he endeth with the Hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian Reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Reus: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jafon, the Brother of Onias, who after the death of Selenus, prevailed with Antiochus Ephippas, his Successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Josius and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Artaeus King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Greeks, as to their Brothers and Kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, joined the Brother and Successor of Reus, remembering in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the People of Sparta by Naminius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Artaeus had sent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Josius adds, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were Sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her Claws.

Now to this Selenus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Ephippas, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second Son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his Brother; which also he usurped from his Brothers Son.

Ptolemy Philometor, his Nephew by his Sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about feventeen years King of Egypt.

Ptolemy Ephippas, the Father of this King Philometor, had Reigned in Egypt four and twenty years, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilst he was a Child. But they found such other business, ere long, with the Romans, as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave, with his Daughter Daughter in Marriage, unto this Ptolemy, the Provinces of Calydny, Phoenicia, and Judea, which he had won by his Victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in those Parts. Nevertheless, Ptolemy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind him two Sons; this Ptolemy Philometor, and Ptolemy Physcon, with a Daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was Wife to the elder of her Brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her Daughter taken in her stead. Such were the Marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemy Philometor, so called (that is, the lover of his Mother) by a bitter Nick-name, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his Subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom: his younger Brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong Party, got Possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Mempsis, craving Succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the Protection of the young Prince, sought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdom. He sent Apollonius the Son of Mithridates Embassador unto Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him the instructions to persuade the Governor of the young King Philometor, to deliver up that Kingdom into his Hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all Argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongst the Coast of Syria, to Jeppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem, whereby

2. Mac. 4. Jafon the Priest (a Chaplain fit for such a Part) he was with all Pomp and Solemnity, received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Selenus, the Brother and Predecessor of Ephippas, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treasures thereof to Apollonius, the Governor of Calydny and Phoenicia, was dismissed of his wicked Purpose: by Miracle from appointed of his wicked Purpose: by Miracle from Heaven; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the Prayer of Onias; yet sufficed not this Example to terrify others from the like ungodly Practices. Presently upon the death of Selenus, this Jafon, the Brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his Brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threecore Talents of Silver, with other Rents and Sums of Money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jafon, and his being over-reached by another, in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achaemen, when as their malicious Callicrates, who had been too hard for all Worthy and Vertuous Men, was beaten at his own Weapon, by one of his own Condition. It went thus.

One Fire than other burns more furiously.
 One Hawk than other Wolves does bite more freely.
 One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly.
 So one more malicious of Men before,
 Callicrates, false Knave as Knave may be,
 Met with Menalcidas more false than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jafon: who within three years after, was betrayed, and over-bidden by Menelaus the Brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more, obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jafon thereupon being forced to flee from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his Men of War; and to prepare a Fleet for his Expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty Army of Land-Forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the Dominion of two Realms, and enter Egypt with a mighty Company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navy, and moved War against Ptolemas King of Egypt, but Ptolemas was afraid of him and fled, and many were wounded to death. He was many strong Cities, and took away the Spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy of Daniel. He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria got a Victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them to great Riches. For he gave a notable Overthrow to the Captain of Ptolemy, between Pelusium and the Hill Cafius; and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he turned again and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem, with a mighty People, and entered proudly in to the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the Light, and all the Instruments thereof, and the Table of the Show-bread, and the pouring Vessels and the Bowls, and the Golden Basins, and the Vails, and the Crowns, and the Golden Apparel. He took also the Silver and the Gold, and the Precious Jewels, and the Secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian business. As what time he first laid claim to Calydny; justifying his Title by * the same Allegations * which his Father had made; and stiffly asserting, that this Province had not been confiscated over to the Egyptian, or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto Ptolemy, that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt. The Achaemen, Rhodiens, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by several Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was; that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder Brother of the Ptolemies, then should the War be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force; he thought it better to let the two Brothers continue themselves with intestine War, than by the terror of his Arms, threatening destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak estate; the younger, almost ruined by his Invasion: the elder hated and forsaken by his People.

But how weak soever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at goodleasure his other business at Jerusalem or elsewhere. So after the Sack of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch; and then made a Journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Therians and other in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry, ty, to a Concubine of the Kings called Antiochia. For Governour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great Authority about him. In the mean while Meneleus the Brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred Talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his Brother Lysimachus. He sent certain Vessels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a pair to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred Talents promised; the same being now by Softrius eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Jafon) had certain knowledge, being moved with Zeal, and detesting the Sacrilege of Meneleus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge he withdrew himself into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a Suburb to Antioch. In compais it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, Banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner abused to Lust, and other such Voluptuousness. Where it was well done of Onias, to commit himself to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim privilege from the holiness of a Ground consecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for my own opinion; that the inconvenience is far less, to hold this Book as Apocryphal; than to judge this fearful theft which Onias (though a virtuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the Book seems to do. As for this refuge, it could not save the life of the poor old Man: For Meneleus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to stay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counselled him craftily, giving him his right Hand with an Oath, and persuading him to come out of the Sanctuary: he flew him incontinently, without any regard to Righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus, after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his Garment of Purple, and sent his Cloaths, and commanded him to be led throughout the City, and in the same place where he had committed the wickedness against Onias, he was slain as a Murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent Mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemy, a Traytor to Ptolemy Philometor, he condemned innocent Men to death; who justly complained against Meneleus, and his Brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outrageous Will, and not by any regard of Justice: since he revenged the death of Onias; yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias, and they should have been heard as innocents. By reason of such his unsteadiness, this King was commonly termed Egomane; that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphane, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

 Verf. 47.

Mac. 2. 4. c. 33.
 After this, Antiochus made a preparation for a second Voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the City of Jerusalem, forty days long, Horsemen running in the Air with Robes of Gold, and as Bands of Spear-men, and as Troops of Horsemen set in Array, encountering and coursing one against another. Of these Prodigious Signs, or rather fore-warnings of GOD, all Histories have delivered us, some more, some less. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian a Star in the form of a Sword appeared in the Heavens, directly over the City; after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Epiphane, though far greater. In the Comidian Wars, Pliny tells us that Armies were seen flying in the Air from the Morning till the Evening.

In the time of Pope John the Eleventh, a Fountain poured out blood in stead of Water, in or near the City of Genoa; soon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like Prodigious Signs, Vigiera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me the most memorable, because the most notorious. All Men know that in the Emperor Nero, the Offspring of the Cæsars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable Sign gave warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Sacred Eagle fell into her Arms a white Hen, holding a Laurel Branch in her Mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Laurel Branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a fair increase of white Poultry, and from the little Branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Laurel: so that afterwards in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did use to carry in their Hands a Branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the Triumphs ended, to set it again in the same Ground: which Branches were observed, when they happened to wither, to foretell the death of those Persons who carried them in Triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the Broods of the white Hen died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the Heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his Hand, were stricken down with Lightning. That the Jews did not think such strange Signs to be unworthy to be regarded; it appears by their calling upon GOD, and praying, that these Tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the first Voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two Brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemy being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his Brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the Power of their Uncle; thought it the best way to seek entrance into that Royal City, rather by persuasion than by Arms. Phylcom had not as yet forgotten the terror of the former Siege: the Alexandrians though they loved not Phylometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcity of Victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Country; and the Friends of the younger Brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation.

These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Phylometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the fear wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelufium: retaining that City which was the Key of Egypt, to his own use. This consideration wrought also with Phylcom, and with those that were about him; as by the vehement Mediation of Cleopatra their Sister, the two Brethren made an end of all Quarrels.

When

When the News of this Accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the Establishment of the King Phylometor his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger Brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadors; yet he now prepared to make sharp War upon them both. And to that end he presently furnished and sent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Army into Calefryria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhincocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemy. Their Errand was partly to yield Thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Phylometor in his Kingdom; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signify what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an Enemy with so puissant an Army. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition, than that Ptolemy should surrender into his hands, together with the City of Pelufium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set down a day certain, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entered Niler, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemy in Arabia, as in Egypt it self; for Memphis and all about it received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by ease Journeys.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long ago. For if they found, or were concerned to find, little reason for them to be enminded therein. For it was a Civil War: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gave signification, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightful Owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loth to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing jointly in need of help against their Uncle, who prepared and made open War against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable Benefits, should arm in defence of their Kingdom. Rome had been sustaining with Food from Egypt, in the War of Hannibal: when Italy lying waste, had neither Corn nor Money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By help of the Egyptians, had Aratus laid the Foundation of that greatness, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like help, had Rhodes been defended against Demetrius Polioretetes. Neither were these Friendly Turns, which that Bountiful House of the Ptolemies had done for sundry People abroad, ill followed or seconded, by other as bad in requital: but with continuance of future Beneficence, from time to time increased. Wherefore the two Brothers sent abroad confidently for aid: especially to the Rhodian and Achean, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Phylcom and Cleopatra had sent, a year since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they desired in particular, that Lycurtus the brave Warriour might be sent to them as General of all the Auchians, and his Son Polypius General of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily consented: and would immediately have made performance; if Callicrates had not interposed his mischievous Art. He, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousness to the Romans; or much rather envying those Noble Captains, whose Service Kings desired; withstood the common Voice; which was, That their Nation should not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be aiding unto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (he said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such business, as might make them the less able to yield unto the Romans what helpsoever should be required in the Macedonian War. And in this Sentence, he with those of his Faction obstinately persisted; terrifying others with big Words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polypius affirmed, that Martius the late Consul had signified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, might well be spared, to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to perform any Service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could, without trouble, raise thirty or forty thousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theatre where the Assembly was held, a Messenger with Letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conform themselves to the Roman Senate, and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in Peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make Peace; but as in a time of greater business elsewhere, with such mild words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should do any good in the same kind. Yet Polypius and his Friends durst not gain say the Roman Council; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distress; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadors sent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadors of Phylcom and Cleopatra; which having stayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their business to effect until now. The Embassadors delivered their Message in the Name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Phylometor, no less than his Brother and Sister.

In this Embassy of Ptolemy, now requesting help from Rome; appeared a notable change of his Fortune, from such as it had been before three or four years last past. For in the beginning of these his Troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eolus and Phylcom (upon whom the blame was afterwards cast) laid) which had the Government of him, thought his Affairs in such good Estate, that not only he determined to set upon Antiochus, for Calefryria, but would have interposed himself between the Romans and Perseus, as a Competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that this Embassador was by

By a Friend perfwaded, to forget that Point of his Errand. From thefe high Thoughts, he fell on the fudden, by the Rebellion of his Brother and Subjects, to live under protection of the fame Antiochus. And now at fuch time as by a tonement with his Brother and Subjects, he might have feemed to ftand in no need of fuch protection; he hath remaining none other help wherewith to fave both his Kingdom and Life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed againft him. This miserable condition of him, his Brother and Sifter, threw it felf even in the Habit of thofe Embaffadors. They were poorly clad; the Hair of their Heads and Beards over-grown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their Hands Branches of Olive. They thus entered into the Senate, and there fell grovelling and prostrate upon the Floor. Their Garments were not fo mean and mournful nor their Looks and Countenances fo fad and dejected, but that their Speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Country flood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, befecching them to have compaffion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had always remained Friendly and Faithful to the Romans. They faid that the People of Rome had fo much heretofore favoured this Antiochus, particular, and were of fuch Account and Authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleaded, but to fend their Embaffadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his Undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he prefently raife his Siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or fhould any delay; then fhould Ptolemy and Cleopatra be fhortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with shameful difhonour to the Senate and People thereof, in that, in the extrem Dangers of all their Fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with Compaffion, fent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimus, and A. Hoftilius, as Embaffadors, to determine and end the War between thofe Kings. In Commiffion they had left to find King Ptolemy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both underftand, that unlefs they forcefced and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a Friend to the Senate and People of Rome, whom they found obftinate or ufing delay. So thefe Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embaffadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three Days after.

Whilst Popilius and his Fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had tranfported his Army over Lucine, fome forty Miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his Journey, when the Roman Embaffadors met him. After Greeting and Salutations at their firft Encounter, Antiochus offered his Right Hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read thofe Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing elfe. Antiochus did fo; and having a little while confidered of the bufinefs, he told Popilius, That he would advife with his Friends, and then give the Embaffadors their Answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of Speech, which he had by Nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his Hand, willing him to make him fuch an Answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King anfwered at this fo rude and violent a Commandment, after he had ftayed and paused a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatfoever the Senate hath ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his Hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt without any good Will of his Colly Expedition; even in fuch a manner as * Daniel had prophesied long Dan. cap. 11. ver. 25, before; yea, fulfilling every particular Circumftance, both of returning, and of doing mifchief to Jerufalem after his return; like as if thefe things had rather been hiftorifed than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embaffadors, they ftayed a while, and fertled the Kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder Brother, and appointing the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having firft fent away Antiochus's Floor, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian Ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their Demeanour towards Eumenes, Prutias, Maliniffa, and Corys. The end of Perfeus and his Children. The Infolubility of Kingly Eftates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Meflage, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their Conquest of Macedonia. The fame Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay afide thoroughnefs of his natural Condition, and to give good Language to the Achaeans and Aetolians, when he went Embaffador to thofe People of Greece, that were of far lefs power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good Words, and no more than good Words, difmiffed other Embaffadors which came from Rome, in fuch fort, as they complained not much lefs of any menacing Terms, though he performed nothing of their Request. But now the Cafe was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes fent to Rome his Brother Attalus to gratulate the Victory over Perfeus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate againft the Gallo-Greeks, which molefted him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by moft of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himfelf; for it fhould furely be given him. Thefe hopeful promifes tickled Attalus with fuch Ambition, that he either approved, or feemed to approve the motion. But his honeft nature was foon reclaimed by the faithful Counfel of Stratus a Physician; whom Eumenes had fent to Rome of purpofe to keep his Brother upright. So when he came into the Senate, he delivered the Errand about which he had been fent; recounted his own fervices done to the Romans in the late War, * wherewithal he forgot not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could; and finally requested, That the Towns of Aetia and Maronea might be beftowed upon himfelf. * By his omitting to fue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of Audience for that bufinefs alone. Where-

Wherefore, to make him underftand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his defire; but in the Prefents which they gave to him (as was their cuftom to Embaffadors that came with an acceptable Meflage) they ufed fingular Magnificence. Nevertheless, Attalus took no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did fo highly difpleafe the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Aetia and Maronea: thereby making unfeffual their promife; which otherwife they could not, without flame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they fent Embaffadors to them, with fuch inftructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpofe. The difpleafure of the Senate being fo manifefit; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another Voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his fecond Voyage thither, for this neceffity of the third: fince, by his malice to Perfeus, he had layed open unto thefe ambitious Potentates the way to his own Doors. No fooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to ufe him as an Enemy, that came to vifit them in lore: neither could they, in fo doing, have avoided the note of fingular infidelity: and to entertain him as a Friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King fhould be fuffered to come to Rome; and by Vertue thereof fent him home, without expence of much further Complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had been at Rome fome what before; where he was welcomed after a better fafhion. He had learned to behave himfelf as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or defire. For entering into the Senate, he layed down, and kiffed the Threshold, calling the Fellows, and kiffed the Saviours: as alfo he ufed to wear a Cap, after the manner of Slaves newly Manumiffed, profefling himfelf an enfranchifed Bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeed naturally a Slave, and one that by fuch abject Flattery kept himfelf fafe; though doing otherwife greater mifchief than any wherewith Perfeus had been charged. His Errand was, beftides matter of Complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive Education. Further petition he made, to have fome Towns added to his Kingdom: whereto, becaufe the Grant would have been unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardfhip of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate, which, vaunting of the pleafure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him to confent, what effential protection thereby to confent, what effential protection to the Romans gave unto the Children of Kings, that were to their Patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Maliniffa held his Credit with the Romans good. His Quarrels were endless with the Carthaginians: which made the Friendfhip of the Romans to him the more affured. In all Controversies they gave judgment on his fide; and whereas he had invaded the Country of Emorgia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at firft they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppreffion) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due fo long. Now indeed had Rome good caufe to delight upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the Race of Maliniffa himfelf was fhortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He fent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Perfeus; and offered to come thither himfelf, there to fatisfice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good Will was lovingly accepted; His Son rewarded; and he entreated to ftay at home.

Corys the Thracian fent Embaffadors, to excufe himfelf touching the Aid by him given to Perfeus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by Hoftages; and to entreat, That his Son which was taken with the Children of Perfeus, might be fet at liberty for convenient Ranfom. His Excufe was not taken; fince he had voluntarily obliged himfelf to Perfeus, by giving Hoftages without neceffity: Yet was his Son given back to him Ranfom-free; with an addition, that he fhould himfelf better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdom lay between Macedonia and fome barbarous Nations; in which refpect, it was good to hold him in fair Terms.

As for thofe unhappy Kings, Perfeus and Gentius they were led through Rome, with their Children and Friends, in the Triumphs of Aemilius and Anicius. Perfeus had often made fuit to Aemilius, that he might not be put to fuch difgrace: but he ftill received one fcornful answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; wherby was meant, that he might kill himfelf. And furely, had he not hoped for greater Mercy than he found, he would rather have fought his death in Macedonia, than have been beholding to the Courtfees of his inlofer Enemies for a wretched life. The iffue of the Roman Clemency, wherof Aemilius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his Fellow King, had been led in Chains through the Streets, before the Cnaries of their Triumphant Victors, they were committed to Prifon, wherein they remained without hope of releafe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do Sacrifice, he fhould command the Captives to be had away to Prifon, and there put to death: fo as the Honour of the Vanquifher, and Mifery of thofe that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This laft Sentence of Death was remitted unto Perfeus: yea fo, that he had little joy of his Life; but either famifhed himfelf, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by thofe that had him in Cufody; and fo died for want of Sleep. Of his Sons, two died; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto his Father, unto the Fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or at his beft Prefbyter, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In fuch Poverty ended the Royal Houfe of Macedonia: and it ended on the fudden; though fome eight-fcore years after the death of that Monarch, unto whofe Ambition this whole Earth feemed too narrow.

If Perfeus had known it before, that his own Son, fhould one day be compelled to earn his Living by Handy-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnefs of Sovereignty, have commended thofe poor Men to be flain, which had recovered his Treafures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of Diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and and would have considered, that the greatest Oppressors, and the most untrodde Wretches are all subject unto One High Power, governing all alike with absolute Command. But such is our unhappiness; instead of that Blessed Counsel, Do as ye would be done unto; a Sentence teaching all Moderation, and pointing out the way to Felicity; we entertain that arrogant Thought, I will be like to the most High: that is I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly:

— — — Et qui volum occidere quenquam.
Posse volent — — —

Juvenal.
Sat. 10.

*Even they that have no murderous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.*

All, or the most, have a vain desire of ability to do evil without controul: which is a dangerous Temptation unto the performance. GOD, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their own hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Sovereign Authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own Person) some one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his Progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their Brotherhood, or other nearness in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole House, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes, which could not humble themselves to such Flattery; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperors, to murder all their Brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofs hereof. Hereto may be added, that the Heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously and barbarously King Edward the second, was, by reason of a Marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, Heir Apparent to the Crown of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the Race of his Mortal Enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such Examples of the infatigability whereto all Mortal Affairs are subject; as they reach moderation, and admonish the transitory Gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked Precedents, the Evil that may fall on their own Posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy is that Countrey, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That

* GOD is the first and lastest Schoolmaster, that can be devised, for such Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without contrivance to turn it upside-down at their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintus Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own Person, that was led along therein, as part of his own Spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, until the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Caesar, the State had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this Noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the Soldiers; who grudget at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Soldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe Exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much Honour of his Victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased GOD to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one died five days before the Triumph; the other, three Days after it. This loss he bore wisely; and told the People, That he hoped to see the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private Calamity, instead of the publick.

About the same time, Ottavius the Admiral, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Antonia the Prator, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius Prisoner: made their several Triumphs. The Glory of which Magnificent Spectacles; together with the consequence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings either visiting the Imperial City, or offering to visit her, and do their Duties in Person; were enough to lay unto Rome, Summe superbiem; Take upon thee the Majesty, that thy Deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the height. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the Field; having rooted up or cut down, all that kept it from the Eyes and Admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the Beauty it had; the forms of Ambition shall beat her great Boagles and Braveries one against another; her Limbs shall fall off; her Limbs wither, and a Rabble of Barbarous Nations enter the Field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and Conquering Nations, have been the Subject of those Ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and withal of so many Tragical Poets as in the Persons of powerful Princes, and other Mighty Men have complained against Injustice, Time, Destiny; and most of all against the Variable Success of Worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these Undertakings, the greatest Lords of the World have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and soweth in the Wind; than by the affection of bearing Rule, which draweth after it so much Vexation, and so many Cares. And that this is true, the good Advice of Cato to Pylorus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the Living, so is it to the Dead of no use at all; because separate from Knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extream ill Bargain of buying this lasting Discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stoin out of the World without noise; than to be put in mind, that they have purchased the report of their Actions in the World, by Rapine, Oppression and Cruelty, by giving in Spoil the Innocent and Labouring Soul to the Idle and Insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their Ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of Sorrows.

Since

Since the fall of the Roman Empire, (omitting that of the Germans which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his Wings far over his Nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moor out of Granada, have made many Attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the Treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they possess in Europe, they are at this day the most powerful. But as the Turk is now counterpoised by the Persian, so instead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a Defensive War, and in Diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand Pound, continued but for two years or three at the most, they may not only be persuaded to live in Peace, but all their swelling and overflowing Streams may be brought back into their natural Channels and old Banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent and to be regarded; the one seeking to root out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and Sincere Profession thereof; the one to joyn all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the Succession and continuance of this boundless Ambition in Mortal Men, we may add to that which hath been already said; That the Kings and Princes of the World have always laid before them, the Actions, but not the Ends, of those great Ones which preceded them. They are always transported with the Glory of the one, but they never mind the Misery of the other, till they find the Experience in themselves. They neglect the Advice of GOD, while they enjoy Life, or hope it; but they follow the Counsel of Death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into Man all the Wildom of the World, without speaking a Word; which GOD with all the Words of his Law, Promises or Threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hareth and destroyeth Man, is believed; GOD, which hath made him and loves him is always deferred. I have confidered (saith Solomon) all the Works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of Spirit: but who believes it, till Death tells it us. It was Death, which opening the Conscience of Charles the Fifth, made him enjoyn his Son Philip to restore Navarre; and King Francis the First of France, to command that Justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrières, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone, that can suddenly make Man to know himself. He tells the Proud and Insolent, that they are but Abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed Happiness. He takes the account of the Rich, and proves him a Beggar; a naked Begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the Gravel that fills his Mouth. He holds a Glass before the Eyes of the most Beautiful, and makes them see therein, their Deformity and Rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

O Eloquent, Just and Mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the World hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the World and despised: thou hast drawn together all the far stretched Gretnes, all the Pride, Cruelty, and Ambition of Man, and covered it all over with these two narrow Words, Hic jacet.

Lastly, Whereas this Book, by the Title it hath, calls it self, The First Part of the General History of the World, implying a Second, and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewn out; besides many other Discouragements, persuading my Silence; it hath pleased GOD to take that Glorious Prince out of the World, to whom they were directed; whose unspeakable and never enough lamented loss, hath taught me to say with Jeh, Versa est in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the READER.

THE Use of Chronological Tables is needful to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set down all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present Part of this Work; pointing unto the several Matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far disjoyned in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither do I think; that any can be. For howsoever the years of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-near compleat, yet in the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we find many Fractious, and the last year, or years, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and imperfect forms of the year, which were in use among sundry Nations: causing * the Summer Months, in process of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extream confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing Computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such Error as a more intentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to find herein. It may serve to free the Book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgment) from any notorious Anachronicism; which ought to suffice. The Book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only for some Errors of the Press, in the numbering of years, but for some hasty mis-reckonings of mine own; which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall find reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

* See Lib. 2.
Chap. 3. §. 6.

The Titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the Head, as ^{Rome} ^{Nabonassar} there do the Numbers underneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For Example: The Walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319 year from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehoshaphat began his Reign in the 3774 of the Julian Era, in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 year of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forbore to insert those years, which I find not signed with some remarkable Accident: as with the Birth or Death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reign; some change of Government; some Battel fought; or the like. So, of the 13 years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the first; that is, omitting all between the 4 of Jehoshaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17, wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Jehoshaphat his Father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a Page with 12 Lines of idle Cyphers; numbering forth 2, 3, 4, 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and 17 of Jehoshaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the Head of every one, what Place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the Name is the first year of his Reign; at the end, or foot of the Name, (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath are those years of his; which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the year of any remarkable Accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings Name, there is it to be understood; that the same year belonged, not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of his K k k k k fore-govers:

fore-goers: as the first Year of Jehoram King of Israel was the same with the second of his Brother Ahazia, and the 22 of his Father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one place; as in the 3077 Year of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same Year; which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the Years of the Egyptian Kings are set down the Years of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the Day of the Month upon which Nabonassar's Year began: which, how it varied from other Years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or account of Years, from Iphicus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place is, in the Book itself: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set down first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the Year of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his Reign in Persia, in the 55 Olympiad, and the first Year thereof.

Now, for that the Years of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one Month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times : the better to express their several beginnings, some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their several Columns ; oppoſing part of the one Year to part of the other : not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one ſtrait Line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I ſpared, as more troubleſome than uſeful ; ſince the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and ſince the learned might well be without it. It will only be needful to obſerve, that howſoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24 Years elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of Nabonassar, yet the Reign of ſome King may have begun at ſuch a time of the Year as did not ſuit with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will eaſily find my meaning : the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example may explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her Reign the 17 of November, in the Year of our Lord 1558 : She was crowned ; held a Parliament ; brake it up ; threw down Images ; and reformed many things in Religion ; all in her firſt Year : yet not all in that Year 1558, but the greater part in the Year following ; whether we begin with the firſt of January, or with the 25 of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table ; but ſo, as the difference is never of a whole Year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the Years of the World, was devised by that honourable and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian Years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980 Years; which result from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the Years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present Year; or if no Fraction remain, it shews the last Year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498 of this Period, when was fought the great Battel of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, and consequently the Dominical Letter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present account, always exceeds the Years of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a Year, than any other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, from the Flood, from Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in Works of this kind: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.

Phaenon chased out of his Kingdom, which is re- corded by his Son Aegus, in few Years after. The omission of this Interregnum, and reckoning the Years in the forty eighth of Aegus, and reckoning the Years from by themselves, breed considerable difference in the times of the Athenians following: as of Meneleus, Crops, and the rest.	3427 2745 222	14	18	41 96	25	26	25	29
